The Ramakrishna Mission nstitute of Culture Library

Presented by

Dr. Baridbaran Mukerji

RMICL-8

Calcutta Oriental Series, No. 16. E. 9

THE FOUNDATIONS OF INDIAN POETRY and their Historical Development

(General Outlines)

BY

J. NOBEL, PH. D.

Docent for Indian Philology at the University of Berlin, Librarian, Prussian State Library

PUBLISHED BY MR. R. N. SEAL, B.A. 107, MECHUABAZAR STREET.

London Agents,
MESSES. LUZAC & CO.
46, Great Russell Street,
LONDON, W. C.

PRINTED BY MR. N. C. PAUL at the CALCUTTA ORIENTAL PRESS, 107, MECHUABAZAR STREET, CALCUTTA.

PREFACE

Indian Poetry is of a peculiar kind. It is so closely connected with the theory of poetry, that it can only be understood fully when considered from this staddpoint. The Indian poet is not merely a poet, he is also a scholar.

The domain of poetics is a wide one, and in the various periods many learned men have written on and studied this subject. This book does not present the tenor of the alamkārašāstra (poetics) of a limited period, but it is an attempt to describe the historical development of and the connection between the ideas of the older masters of the sāstra. Moreover, only the general questions are treated here, the examination of the special questions as guna, doşa, alamkāra etc. being reserved for a later occasion.

There are four gentlemen to whom I am especially indebted and to whom T wish express my to thanks here: the learned editor of this series. Dr. Narendra Nath Law for his willingness to publish my little work : Prof. Benoy Kumar Sarkar, who showed a warm interest in my work and acted as intermediary between Dr. Narendra Nath Law and me: my colleague in the Prussian State Library at Berlin, Dr. Cl. Sherwood who spent many morning hours in correcting and amending the English: and Dr. S. K. Dz at Calcutta, who not only read the proofs but gave much important information on various questions and on some difficult passages in the Sanskrit text.

Berlin,
April 1923.

J. NOBEL

CONTENTS

| | | | Page |
|---------------------------|-------------|-----|------------|
| Introduction | ••• | ••• | 1 |
| The Effect of Poetry | ••• | ••• | . 37 |
| The Causes of the Kāvya a | nd the Poet | ••• | 43 |
| The Definition of Kāvya | ••• | ••• | 7 8 |
| The Nature of Alamkāra | ••• | ••• | 85 |
| The Soul of Poetry | ••• | ••• | 94 |
| The Rīti | ••• | ••• | 98 |
| The Division of Poetry | ••• | ••• | 126 |

INTRODUCTION

The poetic literature of India, with the exception of that which is of a merely narrative kind, is known under the name of $k\bar{a}vya$; but as a rule, only the epic and lyric works are generally known by that name, while the dramatic literature takes up a more separate position, being a category of its own. It is, however, a fact that the Indian writers on Poetics positively state that the drama also is to be considered as a sort of kāvva. On the other hand, the ālamkārikas in their śāstras never deal exhaustively with the drama, but refer the reader to those works which particularly treat this subject. A book on poetic works in all branches, indeed, would have to be very extensive if the whole of dramatic literature were included. This department of literature has thus become a separate study1.

I The oldest book on dramatic art is the Nātyaŝāstra of Bharata-muni. There is to this day no critical edition of this book, which has always remained the standard work of its kind. The edition of the Kāvyamālā (Vol. 42) can only be called a preliminary edition. Some chapters are edited by P. Regnaudand J. Grossetin Annales du Musée Guimet, Tome 2, Paris 1880, and Annales de l'Université de Lyon, Fasc. 40, Paris 1898, respectively. Another important work is the Daŝarūpa by Dhanañjaya, mainly based on the Nātyaŝāstra. The author lived about the end of the tenth century A. D. A good edition was published by Fitz-Edward Hall, Calcutta 1865. The translation of the Daŝarūpa by G. C. O. Haas (New-York 1912) contains

In speaking of $k\bar{a}vya$ we mean that kind of poetry which claims to be in accordance with certain theories, which are given and founded by a proper science called the Alamkāra-śāstra. Consequently, the $k\bar{a}vya$ cannot be understood and estimated to its full extent but by men of a certain literary accomplishment, who are themselves well-skilled in the conception of the aesthetic beauty of poetry, the learned ones or the men of taste, as they are called in the works on Poetics.

It is not necessary to prove that poetics are possible only under the supposition that Poetry existed already, and that Poetry is older than Poetics; but if we try to go back to the beginning of both Poetry and Poetics, we find that the way ends in obscurity. That, however, is the general fate of all branches of human knowledge. As in the literature of other peoples, only the more precious works remain; so it is also in India. Not only the less valuable works have been lost, but, what we regret a good deal more, also all those which, valuable in themselves, were replaced later by better works.

As regards poetry, our search appears to assume better aspect at the outset because Indian many mistakes (cf. Jacobi's review in Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen 1913, p. 302 ff). A third important work on the same subject as well as on poetics is the Sāhityadarp ma composed by Visvanātha Kavirāja (about the end of the 14th century). Of this there are several editions, e.g. that of E. Roeer and R. Ballantyne, Calcutta 1851, and a translation into English by R. Ballantyne, tyne and Pramadadāsa Mitra, Calcutta 1875.

tradition itself calls Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa the ādi-kāvya¹, but it must be confessed that we do not gain very much by this statement. Let it be granted that according to the researches of Prof. Jacobi, the Rāmāyaṇa probably belongs to the fifth or even the sixth century B. C., and that it is older than the Mahābhārata², still it remains quite uncertain to what extent the individual parts are to be considered as going back to yet older texts. Besides, there is still the difficulty, which up to this day nobody has been able to solve, namely, that of restoring out of the mass of the Rāmāyaṇa, as it is known to us, the old form of the 'ādi-kāvya'. Every manuscript varies from the other to such a degree, and in different places the epic poem has been altered to such an extent, that we are accustomed to speak of various and different versions.

I Not everywhere though. So in Rājasekhara's Kāvyamīmāmsa (Gaekwad's Oriental Series No. 1, p. 7) the Rāmāyana is called itihāsa and the (Mahā-)bhārata samhitā (sa [Vālmīkih] tu mahūmunih pravittavacano Rūmāyanam itihāsam samadrbhat. Dvaipāyanas tu slokaprathamādhvāvī tatprabhūvena satasūhasrīm samhitām Bhūratam). A few lines before we are told that Valmiki invented the aloka and in the second adhyāya (p. 3) Rāmāyana and Bhārata are spoken of in a similar way as being a kind of itihāsa belonging to the category of purana. (Sargah pratisamhārah kalpo manvantarāņvi aņīsavidhili | jagato yatra nibaddham tad vijneyam puranam iti | | "puranapravibheda evetihāsah" ity eke | sa ca dvidhū parikriyāpurākalpābhyūm | yad āhulı | parikriyā purākalpa itihāsagatir dvidhā | svād ekanāyakā pūrvā dvitīyā bahunāyakā // tatra Rāmāyanam Bhāratam codāharane /). In the opinion of Rājasekhara. therefore, the Rāmāyana is older than the Bhārata.

² See H. Jacobi's work: Das Râmâyana, Geschichte und Inhalt, Bonn 1893, p. 100 ff. H. Oldenberg in a posthumous work: Das Mahabharata, Seine Entstehung, sein Inhalt, seine Form, Göttingen 1922, p. 53 ff, does not agree entirely with the theories of Jacobi, without giving.

It is, however, a task not quite hopeless, to examine the older literature, and find out whether there is any connection between it and those literary compositions that are kāvya-like, as, e.g., Rāmāyana is a kāvya, Though I cannot deal fully with the matter here, a few remarks may be allowed. Even in the Riaveda we find several hymns, in which the poets endeavour to leave the low level of mere invocations and in which they are trying to show a certain skill in poetic matters. A real kāvya-style, however, can scarcely be found in any of Rigveda hymns. For this, the distance in time between the Vedic poetry and the Sanskrit period appears to be too great. But going further and investigating the texts of the later and the latest Vedic period, certain passages in the Brāhmanas, which are, however, not very numerous, and especially a little epic work, very important in the development of poetry, the Suparnādhyāya1, however, strict arguments against Jacobi's statements. It is a matter of course that many passages in the great epic go back to older times, but the question is at what time the Mahābhārata or rather Bhārata as a whole, as a Saṃhitā, as Rājaśekhara calls it, was completed. That seems to have been the case later than the composition of the Rāmāyaṇa.

I Edited by Elimar Grube, Berlin 1875. Published also, but only the text, in Albrecht Weber's Indische Studien, Vol. 14.

(which shows the characteristic feature of the Vedic time and, on the other hand, bears the stamp of the kāvya-style) we may find that there is an uninterrupted line leading to that sort of poetry which we meet in the Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki. Perhaps, Vālmīki was the first who created a perfect and great poetic work, and many things may have been introduced by him, so that his work with some right can be regarded the type of literary composition, and thus as the ādi-kāvya.

Large passages of the $R\bar{a}m\bar{a}yana$ could very well have a place in the $k\bar{a}vyas$ of the later period without disagreeing with the poetic theories of the $\bar{a}lamkarikas$. On the other hand, there can be little doubt that many poetic factors, similes, and other details are taken from older works which are lost for ever. On account of the high reputation attached to the $R\bar{a}m\bar{a}yana$ from the beginning, it must be regarded as a matter of course that the less poetic compositions in the period before $V\bar{a}lm\bar{a}k$ could easily fall into oblivion. So the $R\bar{a}m\bar{a}yana$ obtained a position of marked importance in the development of the $k\bar{a}vya$.

The Mahābhārata which, with regard to the text, presents even more difficulties than the Rāmāyana, is not called a kāvya by Indian tradition; but can anybody deny that also in this great epic there are many passages to be found showing very clearly all the characteristics of the kāvya-style? As a whole, the Mahābhārata is, as has been pointed out by Prof. Jacobi, younger than the work of Vālmīki, yet nothing is said thereby with regard to the various parts the epic consists of; and a history of the $k\bar{a}vya$ has to examine the $Mah\bar{a}bh\bar{a}rata$ as well as the $R\bar{a}m\bar{a}yana$.

Thus we may call, with some reserve, the Rāmāyana of Vālmīki a mark-stone in the historical development of the $k\bar{a}v\,y\alpha$ -literature. From here the road leads to Aśvaghosa, Bhāsa, Kālidāsa, Bhāravi, and Magha, only to mention the most important representatives of poetry. The significance of some kāvyas was so great that the less famous works written before them have been forgotten. The fact, however, that during long periods no kāvya is known to us, does not allow us to conclude that during these periods there was no cultivation of the $k\bar{a}vya$ at all. Prof. Max Müller's theory of the "renaissance" of Indian Poetry has been refuted by Prof. Georg Bühler, who after having examined the inscriptions of the Gupta kings has pointed out that in the period before that of Kālidāsa the kāvya-style was on the contrary highly cultivated, which is shown also by the compositions of Asvaghosa1 and Bhasa2, whose dramatic works were discovered lately.

Indian Poetry is written mostly in Sanskrit, and this fact shows that the $k\bar{a}vya$ was not a poetry for the great mass of the people, but only for the educated classes. Besides that, we can read in every $k\bar{a}vya$ that the poets wish to satisfy the wise ones, who alone are able to understand and estimate poetry fully.

F See H. Lüders: Bruchstücke indischer Dramen, Berlin 1911.

² Edited by Ganapati Sāstrin in the Trivandrum Sanskrit Series.

In India all branches of human knowledge, with the exception of that of history in which the Indian people in the older times never took a warm interest, have always been adapted to scientific systems; and the same was done with Poetry, and Poetics soon became a separate system. The poet could not but respect the theories and the rules which were presented by the learned ones in their śāstras, if he wished to be acknowledged. Far from making himself independent of these theories he endeavoured anxiously to be in accordance with every thing laid down by the laws of Poetics and to be, so to speak, mathematically exact in inventing new and varying old forms of similes, in selecting words, phrases etc., which had to agree fully with the rusa of the matter in question.

This science is named $Alamk\bar{a}ra$ - $\delta\bar{a}stra$. If we try to determine its age, we must unfortunately admit that the attempt is a good deal more difficult than to give an historical account of Poetry itself. It has been said before that the writers on Poetics regard the drama as a branch of the $k\bar{a}vya$, but probably dramatic writing and the art of epic and lyric poetry in the older period were independent of each other, dramatic works being the oldest. For it must be conceded

I It is therefore not correct, when R. P is chel (Kultur der Gegenwart, Berlin u. Leipzig 1906 I, 7 p. 201) says that Kālidāsa in the Kumārasambhava has made himself almost entirely free from the rules which are applicable to the mahākāvya, whilst in the Raghuvamša he has followed them. That this view is wrong requires no proof. Besides, there can be little doubt that the Raghuvamša was written after the Kumārasambhava.

that the essential features of the drama and particularly of the older drama belong solely to dramatic art and could not be transferred to epic and lyric poetry. Later on however, when the drama was assuming a more or less epic and lyric character, when the story was interrupted by verses which in a sentimental way described all sorts of situations. then of course dramatic writings and alamkāra-śāstra came together. Thus it became quite natural that in the works dealing with the drama, Poetics were also touched on as far as it was necessary to the dramatic poet. These metrical passages were, however, by nature strange to the drama, because the verses, as it were, tend more to hinder the course of the story than to promote it. The strict kāvya-style could have but a subordinate place in the drama, which was enacted before the eyes of the spectators and thus had to be written in an easier style. Matters however, changed. Already in the age of Kālidāsa and to a much larger extent in that of Bhavabhūti the character of the nāṭakas grew a good deal more lyric and epic, thus approaching that kind of poetry which is to be found in the so-called mahākāvyas, and so dramatic writing was regarded by the alamkārikas as a kind of kāvya.

Now the oldest book treating of poetic matters is a work on dramatic art, viz. the Nāṭya-śāstra. It is said to have been composed at a remote period by Bharata-muni. According to more recent views, however, it is not very much older than Bhāsa, and it must be added that the state of the text as it is printed in the Indian edition is rather bad. Much research and investigation there must be before that important work will take its proper place in the history of Indian Poetry. The great importance of the book cannot be denied, if one bears in mind that it was always regarded as an authority with respect to all matters belonging to the art of dramatic writing and that many of the later books dealing with the same subject are based on it, e.g., the Daśarūpa of Dhanañjaya. Besides the doctrines of dramatic writing, some poetic matters are also dealt with, so far as they are necessary for dramatic poets.

¹ Kāvyamālā no. 42. See above note on p. 1.

Considering the whole mass of books that have been written by Indian scholars on poetics it can be easily seen that the alamkāra-śāstra is not a doctrine the system of which shows uniformity at all. On the contrary, from the beginning to the modern times there has been a steady growth and development. The views of the older works were rejected or modified, one theory was substituted for another, and poetry was regarded from quite different points of view; in short, there was scarcely one theme that did not assume a new aspect in the course of the historical development. Compared with other branches of human knowledge this progress and growth was throughout natural and intelligible and in accordance with the progressive methods employed in treating abstract matters.

The refinement of taste for poetic matters became more and more visible. Even poets who are chronologically not far apart show slight differences in dealing with the poetic material. These differences, however, present themselves a good deal more clearly, if literary compositions of different periods are compared with each other. For instance, it appears a thing hard to believe that the Rāmāvana and the Sisupalavadha belong to the very same sort of poetry, the $k\bar{a}vya$. It is not possible to enumerate these differences shortly here. The quintessence of a poetical work seems to have become different. Regarding Valmiki it is evident that the plot occupies the main interest and that the poet endeavours to narrate a series of actions, which in their totality have an interest of their own, and these events in the history of Rāma and Rāvana are described in a poetical and pleasant manner. The employment of poetic forms is to be considered, as Bhāmaha would say, as a mere exterior (bāhya) ornament. The epic element was regarded as the main part. With respect to Māgha, on the other hand, the description of actions is placed into the background, existing as it were only on account of their being indispensable for another purpose. Poetry has ceased to be a poetical description of the deeds of heroes, poetry has become desirable in itself. The plot of a poem could be told in a few lines. The brilliance and elegance of style, the mathematically and logically exact congruence of the separate parts of similes, and all the other things which are described in the śāstras, was the end the poet was aspiring to. Hence it comes that the stanzas following each other are much less coherent in themselves. On the contrary, every verse stands so to speak like a monument polished by the skill of the highly learned poet, who shows his genius (pratibhā) and his wide experience (éakti) in all matters that have to do with poetry.

As a matter of course these differences, which can be observed during the long period of the kāvya, correspond with the theories of the ālamkārikas. we wish to get a correct idea of the whole kāvya literature and to be qualified to understand the Indian kavi without prejudice, it seems to be necessary to know the views of the theoretic scholars will therefore look into the doctrines of the alam kāra-śāstra, giving a sketch of the views on poetic matters and pointing out by which ways the older theories are assumed and specified by the younger representatives of the sastra. This literature being a very large one, we shall but deal with the older writers on poetics, examining the more recent books only in such cases when it is required for the correct interpretation of the opinions of the classical period.

Before going into detail we will cast a look at the poetical theories the ālaṃkārikas deal with and at the way in which their systems are presented. Leaving aside the Nāṭyaśāstra of Bharata-muni, which as a book on dramatic writing must take its place in the history of that art, the oldest work we know of is the Kāvyālaṃkāra by the famous Bhāmaha. Some older writers we know only by name. The most remarkable among these apparently was Medhāvin or Medhāvirudra, as he may be called more correctly. He is not only mentioned by Bhāmaha, but also in the later works on alaṃkāra, and in commentaries he is frequently cited as a man of great authority. He is said to have been blind. Regarding the fact that many works which seemed lost have been discovered in Indian libraries we may hope that Medhāvirudra's book will come to light some day.

¹ See e. g. Rājašekhara, Kāvyamīmāmsā p. 12, l.1; Namisādhu on Rudraļa's Kāvyālamkāra II, 2; XI, 24.

The Kāvyālamkāra by Bhāmaha, which was edited for the first time some fifteen years ago, did not lose its renown even when poetry was looked upon from a higher point of view. The work is divided into six adhyāyas. After having opened with an introductory verse the author praises the effect and describes the causes of good poetry. Then a highly important question is touched and discussed, viz., that of the position the alamkāra is attaining in poetry. Then the definition of the $k\bar{a}vya$ is given, and thereafter its divisions. The following verses are devoted to a very grave and interesting matter, the $r\bar{\imath}ti$ (style or diction as the Sanskrit term is sometimes, but not quite correctly, translated). Rhāmaha opposes the opinion that are some different ritis. Now, not every way of expressing the sense is to be called a beautiful and correct one. The kavi has to avoid certain dosas or faults. It is stated, however, that the dosas must not in all cases be considered to make a kāvya worthless. There are some things that are far from being strictly correct but are in some way or another sanctioned by tradition. The second book begins with a rejection of the doctrine of the gunas, the rejection being understood, however, indirectly. For the term of quaa itself is not used in this connection by Bhāmaha, who speaks only of madhurya, prasada, and ojas. After having settled this question in only three stanzas, while in other works (e.g. in the Nātyaśāstra or in the Kāvyādarša) it is dealt with much more extensively, the author goes on to define and illustrate the alamkāras, which he considers to be the essence of poetry, as we may guess even from the title Kāvyālamkāra. This theme is exhausted at the end of the third adhyāya. The alamkāras are divided into two groups: sabda and abhidheya-(artha-) alamkāras. When the doctrine of the alamkāras will be treated at length, we shall deal with the question whether something can be guessed from the manner of enumerating the alamkāras, and with certain other things belonging to the same matter. In the fourth book the author gives a full account of the so-called dosas, which, as we said before, in many cases cease to be faults. In the next adhyāya we meet with the elaboration of a logic of poetry (nyāyanirnaya), while in the last chapter the work winds up with a descriptiou of grammatical correctness (sabdasuddhi). may be mentioned that later on Vamana will end his Kāvyālamkārasūtravrtti with a chapter of a similar content.

ı Räjasekhara l. c.: Medhüvirudra-Kumüradüsüdayo jätyandhüh kavayah srüyante.

The next writer on poetics is Dandin. On account of his being connected very closely with Bhāmaha there cannot be a correct judgment of the Kāvyādarša without knowing the latter's Kāvyālamkāra. Dandin appears to be an opponent of Bhāmaha, and his manner of polemics against his predecessor bears a rather personal stamp, which the reader of the Kāvyādarśa can hardly fail to see. Thus, in my opinion, we may be right in assuming as a fact that Dandin, though he wrote his work later than Bhamaha, younger contemporary of Bhamaha. If this statement is correct (and Ι hone reader will come to the same conclusion after having examined the following pages wherein the views regarding the foundations of poetry are dealt with fully) it will become necessary to place both Bhāmaha and Dandin (and not only one of them) either before or after the time of Kalidasa This question, a highly important one for the history of the Sanskrit and Prakrit literature, has not yet been solved with absolute certainty to this day. The only certainty is the life-time of Kālidāsa. He must have flourished about the middle of the fifth century A. D. when Kumāragupta I (455-480) was reigning1. Did Bhāmaha and

If would fill a big volume, if I should attempt to give the literature concerning the date of Kālidāsa and so I will not add a new essay to the older ones. I may mention that in my opinion the title Kumārasambhava can only be completely understood, if we assume that the author has chosen it with respect to king Kumāragupta, and that the title Vikramorvašī in a similar way refers to the surname of Candragupta (Vikramāditya), and that Mallinātha (commenting Meghadūta 14) takes for granted that the well-known philosopher Diùnāga lived before or during the same time as Kālidāsa. By the way it may be mentioned that the commentator Vallabha, Dandin live before or after this time? I confess that formerly I was inclined to put both alamkārikas before Kālidāsa. I cannot prove it by direct arguments, but after having read the work of Bhamaha, I had the impression that it must be a very old book. The authors and works Bhāmaha mentions (Asmakavaméa I, 33; Rāmasarman II, 58; II, 19; Acquiottara II, 19; Sakavardhana II, 47; Rājamitra II, 45; III, 10; Ratnaharana III, 8) are all quite unknown to us. Indeed, the many arguments which were brought forth to strengthen the contrary view do not settle the It is true, however, that Bhāmaha mentions the clouds (jalabhrt) among the things which should not be represented as messengers. What else could Bhāmaha have in view but Kālidāsa's wellknown Meghadūta? But, on the other hand, would Bhāmaha have found fault with it, had he known the Meghadata, which famous and splendid poem must have convinced every man that, on the contrary, a cloud was very well fit for acting the part of a messenger? Some have tried to find out some chronological relation between Bhāmaha and Māgha. Using the term sabdārthau in Sisupālavadha II, 86 Māgha is said to refer to the definition of kāvya who does not give the interpretation concerning Dinnaga, is not an old author, as E. Hultzschthinks, (see introduction to his edition of Kalidasa's Meghadūta), but belongs to the twelfth century, as is shown by K. P. Pathak in the introductory pages to the second edition of the Meghadūta, Poona 1916.

as given by Bhāmaha¹, but if this is considered as an argument I may be allowed to take as an argument of the same force that Kālidāsa in Raghuvamša I, 1 by the words vāgārthāviva samprktau refers to the very same definition of Bhāmaha, and that by this fact Bhāmaha's priority may be taken for granted. By using the simile of śabdārtha, however, Māgha probably refers to that of Kālidāsa or perhaps to some other view and not to the definition of kāvya in Bhāmaha. This argument, however, is of no great value, because the

K. B. Pathak in Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, Vol. 23, p. 31. Against the statements made here, see P. V. Kane in a paper Bhamaha, the Nyasa and Magha ib. Vol. 23, p. 91 ff. Pathak in the essay mentioned above has made an attempt to show that the term nyāsakāra used by Bhāmaha, Kāvyālamkāra VI. 36 refers to linendrabuddhi, a Buddhist commentator on the Kāśikāv tti who must have lived about 700 A. D. and he has defended his arguments against P. V. K a n c (referred to above) in a paper Dandin, the Nyasakara, and Bhamaha, Indian Antiquary 1912, 232-37. Compare also Trivedi's Introduction to the Prataparudriya (Bombay Sanskrit Series Vol. 65) p. xxxv. I am sorry to say that Pathak's arguments in my opinion fail to settle the matter. His polemics against Kielhorn, too, who in Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 1900, part 1, pp. 499-502 dealt with the statements in Śiśupālavadha II, 112 and pointed out that by the words v"tti and nyāsa the author of the Kāśikāv"tti Iinendrabuddhi, is alluded to (what Mallinatha has already said), is far from convincing. The theory of Dandin's priority to Bhamaha assumed by K. B. Pathak and other scholars, needs no further refutation. That the contrary is correct will be shown by the pages below.

so-called definition of kāvya (as consisting of word and sense united) may go back to some older ālaṃkārikas and because, as will be shown later on, that definition in the same or a similar form is given also by scholars posterior to Bhāmaha. Nevertheless, Bhāmaha (and Daṇḍin) seem to have written after the time of Kālidāsa. Prof. Jacobi¹³ draws my attention to the fact that Bhāmaha in V, 28, 29 refers clearly to Dharmakīrti's Nyāyabindu III, 138, 139¹⁴. In other cases, however, Bhāmaha seems to be dependent on the philosopher Dinnāga, who is older than or rather contemporaneous with Kālidāsa and is, according to Mallinātha, alluded to in Meghadāta 14.

To return to D a n d i n, the Kavyādarśa 15 condūṣaṇa(ṃ) nyūnatūdyuktir nyūnaṃ hetvūdinūtha ca | tanmūlatvāt kathūyās ca nyūnaṃ neṣṭaṃ pratijñayā || jātayo dūṣaṇābhūsās tūḥ sūdharmyasamūdh(dṛ)ayaḥ | tāsāṃ prapañco bahudhā bhūyastvūd iha noditaḥ ||

Dharmakīrti's Nyāyabindu (Bibliotheca Buddhica Vol. VII, p. 94), III 138, 139:

dūşanāni nyūnatādyuktiḥ ||
ye pūrvam nyūnatādayaḥ sādhanadoṣā uktās teṣām udbhāvanam dūṣaṇam | tena pareṣṭārthasiddhipratibandhāt ||
(

15 Edited several times, e.g. at Calcutta 1863, with a very good commentary by Premacandra Tarkavāgīša. Another Indian edition was published by verse and after having referred in a general way to the older works on poetics, Dandin praises the advantages of good poetry, in a manner similar to that of Bhāmaha. In order to explain what is meant by good poetry, śāstras have been composed, which deal with the body (śarīra) of poetry and its ornaments (alaṃkāra in the wider sense of this word). Daṇdin next gives an account of the body. We meet with the definition and division of kāvya. These explanations are, to a greater part, to be considered as a refutation and a correction of the views of his predecessor.

¹³ In a letter dated March 29, 1922. Prof. Jacobi's paper on this subject entitled Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin, ihr Alter und ihre Stellung in der indischen Poetik, is now printed in Sitzungsberichte d. preuss. Akad. d. Wiss. 1922.

¹⁴ Bhāmaha V, 28, 29:

Then Dandin goes on to give a detailed account of the doctrines of both rīti and guṇa, thus indicating a point of view different from Bhāmaha's treatment of the matter, as will be shown below. In the last part of the first book the author points out what is necessary and desirable for becoming a real poet (kavi).

The second adhyāya, which contains not less than 368 verses, is wholly devoted to the definitions and illustrations of the arthālaṃkāras, while in the first 96 stanzas of the last book all the different species of śabdālaṃkāra are dealt with, the illustrative verses being to some extent horribly difficult. Daṇḍin had a special liking too for the riddle (prahe-likā) and gives its divisions in 28 verses. The rest of the adhyāya (51 stanzas) has the doctrine of the so-called ten doşas for its subject.

Vidyāsāgara; fifth edition, Calcutta 1911. There is also a German edition of the text, together with a German translation, by O. Boehtlingk, Leipzig 1891.

The ālamkārikas, who followed Dandin chronologically, were Vāmana and Udbhata. Though they were contemporaries (they both lived at the court of king Jayāpīda, 779-813), their works have but little in common. Perhaps their respective standpoints would have been clearer to us, if the other works of Udbhata were known to us. Both Udbhata and Vāmana are well acquainted with Bhāmaha.

Vāmana 16 was the first to treat the matter in sūtra-form. These sūtras were of course, hardly comprehensible by themselves; a commentary was needed, the author of which is also Vāmana. Thus his work goes under the name Kāvyālamkāra-sūtra-vṛtti. It is worth noting that this title may have been chosen with reference to Bhāmaha, whose work bears the same name Kāvyālamkāra. It is divided into five adhikaranas: the first containing three, the second and third two, the fourth three, and the last two adhyāyas.

¹⁶ Edited as No. 134 and 140, in the Benares Sanskrit Series, 1907-08; as No. 5 in the Sri Vani Vilas Sastra Series, Srirangam, 1909; as No. 15 in the Kāvyamālā, Bombay, 1889; in Germany by C. Cappeller, Jena, 1875. The same scholar also gave the text and translation alone of the last book of Vāmana's, under the title: Stilregeln, Strassburg, 1880. A translation of the entire work of Vāmana is given by Pandit Gangānātha Jhā, Indian Thought Series, no. 3, Allahabad, 1911-12. There are, besides, some other editions, which I will not enumerate here.

Vāmana opens with the statement that the kāvya is acceptable on account of its embellishments (alamkāra in the wider sense). Then is pointed out what is meant by the word alamkara, i. e. the avoidance of the dosas and the employment of the quas and alamkāras (in the narrower sense). In the last sūtra of the first adhyāya the effect of a good kāvya is spoken of. Then the question is answered as to who should be taught to compose a kāvya. Next. Vāmana deals with the riti, which according to him is the soul of poetry. In doing so, he presents, on the one hand, a contrast to Bhamaha and, on the other hand. he accepts to some extent the views of the author of the Kāvyādarša. In the last adhyāya of the first adhikarana Vāmana describes the so-called angas of the kāvya, this matter forming the subject of twenty sutras. Here we find everything mentioned which is to be studied by one who intends to become a kavi. The first adhikarana winds up with the divisions of poetry. The author then proceeds to present a full account of the dosas. There are three kinds of dosas, viz. pada-, vākya-, and vakyartha-dosas. As a pendant of the dosas Vāmana in the following sūtras deals exhaustively with the gunas, which are divided into sabda (or bandha) and artha-gunas. The whole fourth adhikarana gives the doctrine of both sabda- and arthaalamkāras, the last being regarded as mere subdivisions of the main figure: upamā. After the example of Bhāmaha the work closes with the doctrine of poetic conventions (kāvya-samaya) and of the correctness of words (sabda-sodhana).

With respect to U d b h a t a, it is a matter of regret that only his Kāvyālamkāra-sāra-samgraha has been edited¹⁷, which work is closely connected with the poetics of Bhāmaha, as is already suggested by the title. The six books of the work consist of the treatment of the śabda- and arthālamkāras. Udbhata wrote some other works, too, the most important and interesting one being his commentary on Bhāmaha. As a manuscript of it is extant we may hope that it will be published as soon as possible.

A good deal more extensive than the works mentioned before is the Kāvyālamkara of R u d r a t a¹⁸ bearing (which fact is interesting) the same title as the poetics of Bhāmaha. There are many views with regard to the time of that ālamkārika¹⁹. Some say that his work was written in the second half of the 11th century A.D., others are inclined to assume that Rudrata did not live after the middle of the 9th century while others again would find out that he lived about 950 A.D., At present, we may take it as a matter of fact that he lived about or rather before 850 A.D., because an opinion of his is discussed and rejected in the Kāvyāmīmāmsā²⁰ by the famous Rājasekhara, who belongs to the end of the 9th or the beginning of the 10th century. We must further bear in mind that the Kāvyālamkāra of Rudrata, though dealing with the whole matter of poetry, does not say one word with respect to the doctrine of dhvani, which is discussed fully in the Dhvanyāloka and which is referred to in all later works on poetics. Since the Dhvanyāloka was written about the middle of the 9th century, the Kāvyālamkāra cannot be placed after that time.

¹⁷ The text is given by Jacob in Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, London 1897, a great part of the verses also by Trivedi in his notes to Vidyānātha's Pratāparudrīya (Bombay Sanskrit Series No. 65.).

¹⁸ Kāvyamālā vol. 2, Bombay 1886.

¹⁹ See R. Pischel, Rudrata's Śrigaratilaka and Ruyyaka's Sahrdayalîk, Kiel 1886, Introduction.

The work of Rudrata is one of the more difficult. books on alamkāra. It consists of sixteen adhyāyas, composed in the arya-metre. After a short introduction, the author speaks of the effect of good poetry and goes on to deal with all a kavi should know. The second book begins with the definition of kāvya (as the union of word and sense, sabda and artha). With this we have an indication of nearly the whole Kāvyālamkāra. Rudrata intends to discuss first the nature and qualities of the word (sabda) and then those of the the sense (artha). With regard to the noun, Rudrata, after some general remarks on the word, discriminates between two kinds, compound and non-compound, this division being a highly important one because thereupoh are based the differences of the riti. Then the author defines the vākya which, on the one hand, may be divided into prose (gadya) and metre (chandogata) and, on the other, into further divisions according to the language in which the $k\bar{a}vya$ is written. The remaining chapters discuss the sabdalamkaras, the śabdadosas and the vākyadosas. The first part of the definition of kāvya being herewith completed, Rudrata takes up the second part, artha. Under this heading there is presented a full description of arthalamkaras. which are to be regarded from four different standpoints, viz. vāstava, aupamya, atišava, and šlesa. This treatment of the matter seems to have some connection with a similar opinion of Vāmana, for we may remember that this ālamkārika regards all the the figures of speech from the point of view of aupamya. the artha-dosas are described and especially that of upamā. The doctrine of the rasas, which really had its place in dramatic poetry-for the persons of the drama show in fact all shades of sentiments and the reflection of most inner feelings-and which, as a matter of consequence, has never been treated in fulness by the older ālamkārikas Bhāmaha, Dandin, Vāmana, and Udbhaṭa, takes up much room in the Kāvyālamkāra of Rudrata. Among the rasas the srngara-rasa is treated exhaustively, and the doctrine of the nāyaka and the nāyikā and the like is discussed at length. The last book of Rudrata's deals with the various kinds of literary compositions (prabandha).

²⁰ Adhyāya 7, p. 31.

Comparing the alamkāra-śāstra of Rudrata with those of his predecessors it must be confessed that he has endeavoured to present new ideas. Though many subjects he treats of are spoken of for the first time by him and though he has given new shapes to old views, Rudrata must be regarded as belonging to the older school of the alamkāra-śāstra. As a matter of fact he is entirely untouched by the doctrine of the dhvani, which was gaining a great influence upon the further development of poetics.

This aesthetic criticism was brought into a system by the author of the Dhvanya loka about the middle of the 9th century A.D. 21. It is now settled as a fact that Anandavardnana is the author of the vrtti only, and not also of the kārikās 21a. That the doctrine of the dhvani, however, had in some way or other been treated already before the time of the Dhvanyāloka, may be gathered from the words of the author himself. There is, however, little doubt that in dealing with the new views and developing them at length, the Dhavanikara and Anandavardhua of Kashmir played the chief part. The idea is this: poetry is of value only when the matter the poet wishes to deal with is presented to the hearer by mere suggestion; simple description of events in plain terms has nothing to do with poetry. In one word, the unspoken is the essence of poetry. With this idea wrote Kālidāsa and the other great poets long before the real quintessence of poetry was analysed and reasoned out in books on this subject. The correctness of the new idea being acknowledged by all who had a taste for poetics, the doctrine laid down in the Dhvanyāloka could not fail to influence all the later works on alamkāra.

²¹ The text is edited in Kāvyamālā No. 25, Bombay 1891. Translated into German by H. Jacobi, Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenlaendischen Gesellschaft, Vol. 56 and 57, 1902-03, Ānandavardhana's name (Ānanda) is quoted in the Kāvyamīmāmsā of Rājašekhara, p. 16 (pratibhāvyutpattyoh pratibhā śreyasī ity Ānandaḥ | sa hi kaver avyutpatti-kṛtam doṣam āśeṣam ācchādayati; tad āha | avyutpattikṛto doṣah śaktyā saṃvriyate kaveh, yas tv aŝakti-kṛtas tasya jhatīty evāvabhāsate.) See Dhvanyāloka, p. 137 (3rd uddy.).

²¹a See also the excellent paper by S. K. Dé: The Text of Kāvyāloka-locana IV. Reprinted from the journal of the Department of Letters vol. ix. Calcutta University pr. 1923, p. 2 f

We cannot pursue the theme further here, where we are going to inquire into the development of the ideas as they were presented by the old masters. Though the doctrine of the dhvani attained a very great significance for poetic criticism, the older theories are by no means put aside, but they hold their place as constituting the foundation of the $k\bar{a}vya$.

The big work of Mammata, the Kāvya-prakāśa³², shows clearly the influence that the dhvanidoctrine was gaining. Mammata lived in the 11th century. Though his work is written in verse throughout, the expression is as brief and condensed as possible and thus rather bears the character of the sūtra-style. We are therefore not surprised that Mammata himself composed a commentary on it²².

²² Edited many times in India, e.g. with a great commentary by Bhaṭṭa Vāmanācārya B. R. Jhalakīkara, Bombay 1901 (2nd ed.). For an English translation we are indebted to Gaṅgānātha Jhā, Benares 1897-99 (From Pandit, Vols. 18-21).

²²a There are, however, some doubts about the authorship of the Kāvyaprakāśa. See V. Sukthankar, Miscellaneous Notes on Mammata's Kāvyaprakāśa, Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenlaendischen Gesellschaft, Vol. 66, p. 477 ff and 533 ff.

The Kāvyaprakāsa consists of ten ullāsas. The author opens in the same way as his predecessors by pointing out what the effect of good poetry is, and what attributes, besides learning, are to be rerarded as necessary for becoming a poet. After that, the definition of the kāvya is given, and Mammata turns to the divisions of poetry. Here we meet with the higher criticism of dhvani. According to the degree in which the suggested meaning (dhvani) prevails there are three kinds of poetry. question is discussed further, up to the end of the sixth ullāsa, starting from the nature of words and ending with the doctrine of rasa, which is dealt with from the standpoint of dhvani. Then the various kinds of dosas are enumerated, and in connection with this, the views regarding the gunas are criticised. In the ninth and tenth ullasas Mammata treats of the alamkāras, which in the meanwhile have become a good deal more numerous.

By mentioning Mammata the chronological line of the writers on the alamkāra-śāstra has been interrupted. The most peculiar feature of the book, however, which I am now presenting to the reader, justifies me in speaking of the Kāvyaprakāśa so soon. We have to deal now with a theoretical work of the well-known dramatist Rājaśek hara, who lived about 900 A.D. He is younger than Rudrata and Ānandavardhana, who are both mentioned by him. The work is entitled Kāvya-mīmāṃsā. This highly interesting book, which also gives important information about other matters, is edited as the first volume of the brilliant Gaekwad's Oriental Series, 1919.

The text now published is but a small part of the whole Kānyamīmāmsā, bearing the title Kavirahasya. This is evident from Rājašekhara's own statements, especially in the introductory lines, but since a manuscript of the other parts has not yet been found, we are not quite sure whether the author did not get further than the end of the first adhikarana, so that the work must be regarded as incomplete, or whether other parts are unknown, because the manuscripts have not been found or are lost. The copious notes the learned editors of the Kāvyamīmāmsā have added to the text show that the author has very often referred to older works, both kāvyas and śāstras.

The style of Rājasekhara's book differs a good deal from that of his predecessors, the main part being written in simple prose, but not in sūtra-form which Vāmana or the Dhvanikāra used. The prose, however, is interrupted by more or less large passages in verse, which, on the one hand, support the ideas presented in the prose-parts, and, on the other, in a more independent way give some further details. Though in dealing with the matter, the author shows a certain raciness of expression and tells plenty of interesting facts, he is in many cases not free from pedantry, particularly in finding out new groups and divisions.

The Kavirahasya (as the first adhikarana of the Kāvyamīmāmsā is called) consists of eighteen adhyāyas each of them having titles. In the first (sāstrasamgraha) the various kinds of poetic matters are enumerated. The second adhyāya (sāstranirāssa) shows that there are two kinds of literary composition (vānmaya), viz., śāstra and kāvya, the śāstra being considered as previous to kāvya. With respect to the former, Rajasekhara gives subdivisions and explanations, speaking of the style of the sastra and of the various forms and designations of commentaries With the next adhyāya (kāvyapurusotpatti) the author begins the principal matter, the doctrine of the kāvya. There we are told that the goddess of Speech, Sarasvatī, longing for a son, underwent severe penitential exercises. She, then, bore a son, the Kāvyapurusa. Rājasekhara gives a story of the encounter of Valmiki, the inventor of the śloka and author of the itihāsa Rāmāyaņa, with the lonely wandering Kāvyapuruşa. In telling this, the author mentions also Dvaipāyana, who was the first to study the sloka (invented by Valmiki) and composed the samhitā Bhārata, which is said to consist of 100,000 ślokas. In course of time the bride of the Kāvyapuruṣa became Sāhityavidyā (vadhū). On account of her wandering through many countries, some poetic forms evolved themselves, the most important among them being the three ritis, Gaudiya, Pancali, and Vaidarbhī. These stories may be regarded as introductory. In the fourth adhyāya (the title of which seems to be incorrect, being the same as that of the sixth chapter, padavākyaviveka) goes on to deal with the nature of the kavi. The students of kāvya are said to have different degrees of understanding. differentiation appears to have been influenced by a passage in the Arthasāstra of the famous Kautilya, whose theories Rajasekhara sometimes makes use of also elsewhere. Then the author continues to point out what things are requisite and desirable for everyone who wishes to become a kavi. Speaking of the pratibhā (the inborn and working fancy of the poet) Rajasekhara attaches much value to its twofold nature, viz., as kārayitrī and bhāvayitrī. These remarks show the influence of Vamana very clearly. Hereafter, in the fifth chapter (kāvyapāka), vyutpatti (the literary education) is dealt with. Rājasekhara describes the relation between vyutpatti and pratibha, quotes the views of other authorities (among these also the view of his wife Avantisundari), states several groups of the kavi, going a good deal into detail, and criticises again and again the theories of his predecessors. The sixth adhyaya (padavākyaviveka) has the doctrine of pada (word) and vākya (sentence) as the subject. The definition of poetry (kāvya) is presented here. In the next chapter (pāṭhapratiṣṭhā) Rājaśekhara discusses the various kinds of expression with respect to the speaker (gods, man, and so on), the language (Sanskrit, Prākrit, Bhūtabhāşa) being dependant on them. After having mentioned the varieties of rīti (Gaudīyā, Pāñcālī, Vaidarbhi), the author deals with another factor which in his opinion has a peculiar interest, namely recitation, kāku or pātha. As a matter of fact, this passage is a highly important one, because it shows what kind of pronunciation the various peoples of India used. That an opinion of Rudrata regarding the same subject is rejected by Rajasekhara, is of importance with respect to the chronological relation between these two writers on poetics. The mere title of the eighth adhyāya (kāvyārthayonayah) calls to mind a certain passage in Vāmana's Kāvvālomkārasūtravrtti. Here we find all matters communicated which are important with regard to the contents of a kāvya (éruti, smrti, itihāsa etc.) It need hardly be mentioned that the author adds some new groups to the old ones, but it must be confessed that in inventing new subdivisions Rājasekhara here (as well as elsewhere) shows a good deal of overmuch pedantry. The next chapter (arthavyāpti) discusses the contents of kāvya. The opinion of Drauhini that with respect to the contents there are three kinds, viz, divya, mānuṣa, and divyamānuṣa, is refuted by declaring that seven kinds must be assumed, since pātālīya, martyapātālīya, and divyamartyapātālīya have to be added. Rajasekhara is careful to illustrate the seven kinds by examples. After having done so, the author gives some explanations of descriptions (of rivers, mountains, towns, separation etc.) enlivened by the rasas. A few remarks about the nature of things as they are in reality and as they are represented by the fancy of the poet are of a interest. Then Rajasekhara speaks of certain two forms regarding the contents, viz. (a single stanza, closed in itself) and prabandha (a whole composition); and the chapter ends with another subdivision according to the reality or nonreality of the events the kavi describes. The tenth chapter bears the name kavicaryā rājacaryā ca, and, at the outset, points out what branches of learning are necessary to know before one is able to compose a ktoya: vis, grammar, metrics, dictionaries and so on. Besides these, the kavi has to know the accessory sciences (upavidyā), as e.g., the arts etc. Rājasekhara does not forget to lay stress another thing to which the kavi must turn his attention: that is the care of the body. In studying these passages, the reader will be rather amused and compensated for many tiresome explanations and divisions, though here also the descriptions bear the stamp of pedantry which exhausts all possibilities in a wearisome manner. "As the kavi, so the kāvya". Further, the ideal dwelling house of the kavi is described in full detail. Many facts mentioned here are of great interest for us in more than one respect. The names of poetesses are given, for instance; but the chapter culminates in a detailed description of the kavi-examination held by a committee of men selected for this purpose, who sit or stand in the examination-hall in order of rank. The adhyayas 11 to 18 deal with the borrowing (harana) from older poets. The author points out cases in which borrowing is or is not allowed. and goes on to treat all such possible cases. In Rājasekhara's opinion, harana must have been of great importance, since the matter is dealt with in more detail than is agreeable to the reader. The fourteenth and fifteenth chapter (jātidravyakrivāsamayasthāpanā and guņasamayasthāpanā) investigate all kinds of poetic licences and customs, which, though not correct in the strict sense, are sanctioned by tradition. Among many other things we find here the well known relations between colours and affections or conditions of mind and the like.

In the next chapter (svargyapātālīyakavirahasyasthāpanā), the author presents some special doctrines for the svargya and pātālīya poet. The seventeenth adhyāya is more interesting and important, because we glean a geography of India from it. The details given here, however, were not unknown even before this discovery of the Kāvyamīmāṃṣā, for the Jaina monk and polyhistor Hemacandra and another writer on alaṃkāra, the younger Vāgbhata, have almost the same deśavibhāga included in their works. That both have borrowed from Rājašekhara we did not know before the latter's work was published. The Kavirahasya winds up with the eighteenth adhyāya (kālavibhāga), which gives a description of the division of time.

We stayed a little longer with Rājasekhara than with the ālamkārikas before him. This we did because our author deals with poetics in a rather different way and illustrates matters which are not to be found in the works of his predecessors. Later writers on alamkāra, Hemacandra and Vāgbhata, have borrowed long passages from Rājasekhara, often almost verbatim.

Of the later writers on poetics only the more important names shall be mentioned here. Rājā-naka Ruyyaka or Rucaka, who lived in the beginning of the twelfth century, has treated only the alamkāras in his Alamkārasarvasva. The way Ruyyaka takes up the matter and the exact and correct manner in which he delivers the doctrines of the figures of speech and groups them, show clearly what progress had been made regarding poetry. The form of expression is somewhat similar to that of Vāmana, or rather to that of the Dhvani-kāra: the sūtra-text and a commentary on the sūtras which, however, is much more exhaustive than the commentary of Vāmana and constitutes really the main part.

The older $\nabla \bar{a} g b h a t a$, who, like Ruyyaka, also belongs to the beginning of the twelfth century, treats of the whole domain of poetry. His work is entitled $V\bar{a}gbhat\bar{a}lamk\bar{a}ra$ and is written in verse throughout. $V\bar{a}gbhata$ begins with the definition of the $k\bar{a}vya$ and, thereupon, speaks of the purpose of poetry and the causes of it. After giving a division of the $k\bar{a}vya$, he presents the doctrines of the dosas, the gunas, the dhvani, the sabda- and arthālamkāras, the rītis, and the rasas. It must be confessed that the importance of $V\bar{a}gbhata$ is not great.

The compendium of poetics, the Kāvyānušāsana, of the celebrated Jaina monk, He macandra and ra (1088-1172), is a good deal more extensive. He also wrote a great commentary on his own work, the Kāvyānušāsanaviveka. It is a matter of course that Hemacandra could not present original ideas of his own, as he unfolded a somewhat astonishing literary activity. He was a complete master of the knowledge of his time, and had thus in many cases only registered the theories and results his predecessors had found. The sources, however, which Hemacandra used, are partly unknown to us. The discovery of the Kāvyamīmāṃsā of Rājašekhara has shown that Hemacandra in his commentary has borrowed long passages from it; but the name of Rājašekhara is never mentioned. It is possible that other parts of the Kāvyānuśāsanaviveka may go back to other books of the Kāvyamīmāṃsā which have not yet been found.

Hemacandra begins in the usual way with the topic of the effect and cause of poetry. The definition of the kāvya (adosau sagunau sālamkārau ca šabdārthau kāvyam) indicates at the same time the mode of his treatment of different topics. It is explained what guṇa, doṣa, and alamkāra are, and it is pointed out in which way these ideas are connected with the rasa. For though the rasa is a factor of immense importance, it is not mentioned at all in the definition of poetry, because in the opinion of Hemacandra the $k\bar{a}vya$ as consisting of word and sense (śabdārtha) is sanctioned by tradition. The author then presents an account of the doctrine of the word, in course of which the dhuani doctrine is touched on, apparently under the influence of the Kāvyaprakāśa. Hereafter the rasa, and then all kinds of dosas (rasa-, pada-, vākya-, padavākya- and artha-dosas) are characterised. description of the gunas, of which only three are mentioned, also shows among many other things the influence of Mammata. The śabda- and arthālamkāras are detailed in the fifth and the sixth book respectively. This is followed by the doctrine of the nāyaka (hero) and his female counterpart, the nāyikā (heroine). The division of the kāvya forms the last part of Hemacandra's work.

In the 13th century Vagbhata the younger-the older Vagbhata has been mentioned above—composed a work on poetics. In his own commentary on his work, Vāgbhaṭa is influenced also by Rājaśekhara. Vāgbhaṭa's book, though a very large one, is of no great importance. New ideas are scarcely given. In the beginning are discussed the very well known question about the offects and the causes of poetry and the definition of the kāvya, which discussion takes the same form as that of Vagbhata's predecessors. Before illustrating the various parts of the definition, the author speaks of the divisions of poetry. The second and third adhyāya contain the doctrine of the dosas (śabda-, vākya-, artha-dosas), of the gunas (the number of which is given as ten, after Dandin), of the artha- and śabda-alamkāras. There are 62 arthālamkāras, while Hemacandra deals with only 29. The absence of dosas and the presence of gunas and alamkāras form the body (śarīra) of the kāvya, its soul (prāna) being the rasas, which are detailed in the fifth adhyāya.

After this succinct account of more the important representatives of Indian writers on poetics²³, ²³ A complete account of all ālamkārikas (with the exception of Rājaśekhara, whose work was not discovered then) is given by Hari Chand in his book: Kālidāsa et l'Art poétique de l'Inde, Paris 1917. There the reader will find further details with respect to the less important writers on poetic matters and the time they lived in. A work very often referred to is the Sarasvatī-kanthābharana of Bhojarāja (about the middle of the 11th century A. D.). It is, however, a mere compilation and, therefore, is of very small interest. Bhojarāja has let us now deal with the historical development of the theoretical foundations of Indian poetry and see in what manner old and simple ideas are changed in course of time. We shall consider in the following pages the effects of good poetry and the causes of it. shall gain an idea of the qualities which the poet should possess. After this, the various attempts to define the kāvya will be illustrated, and then the general position of the alamkara will be touched on. A further question is: what is to be considered as the soul of the kāvya? A large space will be taken up by the doctrine of the so-called rītis and the quas (though not the whole theory of quass) closely connected with these. Finally, we must treat of the division of the kāvya. In this chapter we shall meet with important questions, which in more than one respect are of the greatest interest.

borrowed long passages from Dandin's Kāvyādarša. Another author of the same time, K s e m e n d r a, wrote two works on the alamkārašāstra the Aucityavicāracarcā and the Kavikanthabharana, which last title reminds one of the work of Bhojarāja. The value of these works is not great. On account of its clearness of description the Candraloka of Jayadeva is highly valued in India. The author lived in the 13th century and also wrote a drama, the Prasannaraghava. The works of Vidyadhara and Vidyanātha (about 1300 A. D.): the Ekāvalī and the Pratāparudrayasobhusana, both edited in the Bombay Sanskrit Series, Nos. 63 and 65, are also of some importance. Jagannātha (17th century) whose Rasagangādhara, though incomplete, takes the first place among all the works of the preceding centuries on account of his independent and original researches, belongs to the modern eriod.

THE EFFECT OF POETRY

Before entering on the discussion of the kāvya itself there are some things of a more general character which the writers on alamkāra deal with in an introductory way. When anything is to be undertaken, it is asked what effects and what causes may be connected with it. The oldest author, B h ā m a h a, treats the question of the effects of good poetry in connection with the question about the qualities of the poet. Not to disturb the context, the verses of Bhāmaha in question will be given when we speak of the kavi. Here we can therefore be short.

Bhāmaha says I,2:

dharmārthakāmamokṣeṣu vaicakṣaṇyaṃ kalāsu ca / prītim karoti kīrtim ca sādhukāvyanibandhanam //

"The composition of a good $k\bar{a}vya$ presents cleverness in (the caturvarga, i.e.) right, wealth, love and liberation, and in the arts, and (presents further) pleasure and fame."

Dandin sees the matter from another point of view, declaring in Kāvyādarša I, 3-6

iha siṣṭānusiṣṭānāṃ siṣṭānām api sarvathā / vācām eva prasādena lokayātrā pravartate // idam andhaṃ tamaḥ kṛtsnaṃ jāyeta bhuvanatrayam / yadi sabdāhvayaṃ jyotir āsaṃsāraṃ na dīpyate // ādirājayasobimbam ādarsaṃ prāpya vānmayam / teṣām asaṃnidhāne 'pi na svayaṃ pasya nasyati // gaur gauḥ kāmadughā samyak prayuktā smaryate ciram / duṣprayuktā punar gotvaṃ prayoktuḥ saiva saṃsati //

"By the favour of words, as well of those which are taught by the grammarians (Sanskrit and Prakrit) as of the others¹ (the various dialects which are not expressly taught by the scholars), business in the world is prospering.

"If the light, called word, did not shine into this existence, then these three worlds would be in complete darkness.

"The idol of fame of the first kings, which manifests itself through the mirror of words, does never vanish even when (the kings) have passed away.

"Well-composed speech is called a cow, which grants every desired object; but composed in a bad way, speech manifests only the ox-nature of the composer²."

Dandin states the relation between the $k\bar{a}vya$ and the fame of the king as follows. According to him, the main purpose of a poem is to narrate and praise the life and deeds of the king, the $k\alpha vi$ being thus, generally, a court poet.

Vā man a appears to depend on Bhāmaha, saying in Kāvyālamkārasūtravrtti I. 1. 5:

Kāvyam saddrstādrstārtham prītikīrtihetutvāt.

"Because the $k\bar{a}vy\alpha$ is the cause of pleasure and fame, its effect is (twofold): to be seen and not to be seen."

Pleasure is visible, but fame is not visible, as r Premacandra has a second interpretation of the word sista: svatah sistānām sanyīnārūpānām. But the first appears to be the better.

² Premacandra: gotvam vişabhatvam murkhatvamityarthah, it manifests itself mostly after the poet has passed away. Fame, however, stands higher than pleasure, as Vāmana points out in the following verses:

"The merit of composing a $k\bar{a}vya$ is considered as an uninterrupted road (leading) to fame. The ridiculousness of being a bad kavi is said to be a way to shame.

"The learned ones designate fame as something leading to heaven in the end, shame, on the other hand, as leading to the places of hell. To attain fame and to avoid shame, the "king-poets" ought to study the contents of (this) Kāvyālaṃkāra thoroughly."

The matter in question is dealt with in a much more detailed way by R u d r a t a, whose words run thus ($K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}lamk\bar{a}ra$ I. 5-13):

"When in course of time the temples etc., erected by the kings are fallen to decay, then even the names (of the kings) would not remain, if the kings had no good poets.

"Does not a person render a good service to another by displaying his fame, which will last for ever and will be pure and faultless and desirable for all the world?

"And the learned ones⁴, who have studied the highest things, agree with each other in stating that to bestow benefits on a person is of quite a special merit.

^{3.} Compare Raghuvaṃśa 1. 3: mandal kaviyaśaliprārthī gamisyāmy upahāsyatām.

^{4.} Vādinaķ. Or should it be translated: "men, who in other cases dispute with each other, agree in this matter ..."?

That is the very idea of which Dandin has spoken: the kavi par excellence is the court poet of the king, and the king must bear in mind what the poet may become to him! But besides that, the blessings of good poetry are evident also with respect to other things:

"The poet who has composed beautiful panegyrics of the gods attains wealth, liberation from evils, fortune beyond measure, in short, all he may desire.

"So some poets by praising Durgā have crossed (the stream of) misfortune which is hard to do; others have turned away sickness; others again have got a much-longed-for gift.

"The gods who have fulfilled the poet's wishes as a reward for the panegyrics are the same even to this day, though the kings have changed.

"Yet, why shall I say much? Who in the world may be enabled to comprehend to which high degree the $k\bar{a}vya$, this ocean with its jewels, brilliant excellences (the poem is filled with), becomes the cause of eminent fame?"

In the next verses Rudrața varies the words of Bhāmaha:

"Therefore the wise ones, who wish to gain a full success in the (four) manifestations of human life (dharma, artha, $k\bar{a}ma$, moksa) may compose a $k\bar{a}vya$ as faultless as possible after having studied what is necessary for it.

"For, the fine formation of speech derived from the acknowledged éāstras (dealing with the correct formation) of word and sentence, is the fruit of the learned ones and well-formed speech, on the other hand, matures a splendid kāvya."

Mammata's statements about this matter may be quoted, as they contain some interesting details. Kāvyaprakāśa 1-2:

Kāvyam yasase 'rthakṛte vyavahāravide sivetarakṣataye, sadyaḥ paranirvṛtaye kāntāsammitatayopadesayuje.

The vrtti thereon runs thus:

"The composition of a $k\bar{a}vya$ leads to fame, to wealth, to understanding of all worldly business, to removal of all sorts of evils, to immediate or later pleasure joined with an instruction similar to that, which may be given by a beloved woman⁵)."

"Fame, as in the case of Kālidāsa and others, wealth in the case of Dhāvaka etc. from king Harşa, understanding of all wordly business for kings etc., removal of all sorts of evils, as in the case of Māyūra etc. from the Sun etc. The crown, however, of all is the complete pleasure, which is caused by the taste of rasa and which takes away all other sentiments."

The last words show that no little progress has been made in judging poetry: the last cause, why a good $k\bar{a}vya$ is a course of untroubled joy and pleasure, is the rasa, the poetic sentiment, which is the strong quintessence of all poetry. Regarding the matter from this point of view Mammata continues to show in which respect poetry differs from other kinds of literary compositions:

⁵ This stanza is quoted by Mallinātha in the beginning of his commentaries to the five mahākāvyas.

"By the fact that in the $k\bar{a}vu\alpha$ word and sense (sabdartha) recede into the background, the unfolding of the single parts of the rasa is placed into the foreground. Thereby the $k\bar{a}vua$ differs, on the one hand. from the sciences as Veda etc., where the word forms the main part, like the (command) of a king (prabhusammita), and, on the other differs from the mere narrative literature as the Puranas etc., where the main part is the sense, in the manner of (an instruction) from a friend (suhrt-sammita). Thus, the kāvya is the work of a poet who is skilled in presenting a matter in a manner that goes far beyond the common way. As a beloved woman by means of her graceful attraction (rasa) gains (her lover's) interest (and so may get from him what she wishes), in the same way the kāvya presents instruction in a fitting manner both for the poet and the knowing ones (the hearers of the kāvya), an instruction similar to that of Rāma and not to that of Ravana. Therefore one should use the utmost endeavour with respect to the kāvya."6

Mammata here gives a few more details about the matter in question than his predecessors did, regarding poetry from a higher standpoint. The ideas he speaks of in a certain degree belong already to the question as to the real nature of poetry and to the definition of the $k\bar{a}vya$.

⁶ The Ekāvalī, which generally is based on the Kāvyaprakāša, has borrowed these similes from Mammaṭa in the verses I, 3-6.

THE CAUSES OF THE KAVYA

Scholars agree, as we have seen, that a good kāvya produces many desirable effects for both the author and the hearer. They agree also that these effects can only be expected from the composition of a good kāvya. Thus, the question of the kāvya-phala (effects of poetry) is connected with that of the kāvyakaraṇa (causes of poetry). In other words, how should the poet (kavi) be? Going into the treatment of this matter it cannot be avoided to take up some things here which strictly speaking belong to the preceding chapter, where the effects of poetry were spoken of, but Bhāmaha does not, as mentioned before, separate kāvyaphala and kāvyakaraṇa strictly.

Right at the beginning of his work he says (I, 3-5):

"What liberality is to the poor, what skill (in using weapons) is to the coward, what cleverness is to the ignorant, that very same is knowledge of the śāstra to a man who is no kavi (by nature).

What is wealth without good conduct, what is night without the moon, what is ability in speech without being a good kavi.

Even the untalented ones are able to study the sastra with the aid of the instruction of the teacher,

I This stanza (Bhāmaha i, 4) is quoted as an example for the arthālamkāra Vinokti in Ruyyaka's Alamkārasarvasva p. 83.

but the $k\bar{a}vya$ can be composed only by a man who possesses the $pratibh\bar{a}$ (the working genius)".

Not everybody has the art of producing literary compositions, and one who is not endowed with it by nature can never learn it by studying the sastra. The innate genius is called pratibha, verbatim the beaming of the ideas.'

On this occasion Bhāmaha speaks of the effects of good poetry (I, 6-8):

"Even when those who have produced a good literary composition go to heaven, their body, which consists of the $k\bar{a}vya$, remains pure and pleasent (on the earth).

And as long as the poet's fame, everlasting, fills heaven and earth, so long the poet, who has done good work, attains the celestial abode.

One who, therefore, longs for fame that will last as long as the world will remain, may endeavour to compose a $k\bar{a}vya$ after having studied all that the kavi should know."

There is no doubt that the genius is the condition sine quanton for the poet; but there are, on the other hand, some other things not less necessary. Bhāmaha deals with them in the verses 9-11:

śabdaś chando' bhidhānārthā itihāsāśrayāḥ kathāḥ, loko yuktiḥ kalāś ceti mantavyāḥ kāvyayonayaḥ². śabdābhidheye vijñāya kṛtvā tadvidupāsanām, vilokyānyanibandhāmś ca kāryaḥ kāvyakriyādaraḥ.

² With respect to the text of this verse, the end of which is not given in the edition of Bhāmaha, see the notes to Rājašekhara's Kāvyamīmāṃsā p. 8. The first line is found in the Dhvanyālokalocana p, 10.

sarvathā padam apy ekam na nigādyam avadyavat, vilaksmanā hi kāvyena duḥsuteneva nindyate.

"(The doctrine of the) word, metre, sense of the words, stories which are based on the itihāsas, the (knowledge of) world (ly affairs), suitability, and the arts, all these are held to be the foundations of the kāvya.

After having made oneself acquainted with (the doctrine of) word and sense, after having devoted oneself to the teaching of the masters who know that, and finally, after having studied the compositions of other poets one should endeavour to make a kāvya.

One should never utter a word which contains something blamable, for on account of a kāvya that shows bad features one is blamed as on account of a bad son."

Bhāmaha is very hard on the bad poet (I-12):

"The fact that a man is no kavi does not implicate his dharma-lessness, his illness, or even his punishment. But the state of a bad poet is called the embodied death itself by the knowing ones."

³ The doctrine of the word is the grammar (śabdānu śāsana); see Vāmana I, 3, 4.

⁴ The author apparently means the knowledge of the dictionaries; cf., below, Vāmana I, 3, 5: abhidhānakośāt padārthaniścayaḥ. An interpretation different from this is presented by Udbhaṭa in his (not yet edited) commentary to Bhāmaha (Bhandarkar Commemoration Volume, p. 405, note 2): śabdānām abhidhānam adhivyāpāro mukhyo guņavṛttiš ca. Trivedi remarks: Should it not be explained as abhidhānam abhidhāvyāpāraḥ upalakṣaṇam idam tena lakṣaṇavyañjanayor api grahaṇam;ity arthaḥ? For Bhāmaha is not dhvanyabhāvavādī, one who does not believe in the existence of the suggested meaning."

⁵ Then things are to be considered in a suitable way.

The postulate which are laid down by Bhāmaha are taken up by Daṇḍin, only a little more pregnantly. We read in kāvyādarśa 1-103;

naisargikī ca pratibhā śrutam ca bahu nirmalam, amandaś cābhiyogo'syāḥ kāraṇam kāvyasampadaḥ

"Innate talent, great and profound scholarship, uninterrupted practice are the cause of that success of the $k\bar{a}vya$."

In the next verses, however, Dandin proceeds to contradict his predecessor in an important point. In the opinion of Bhāmaha the pratibhā (genius) is a necessary condition without which a kāvya can by no means be composed. Dandin denies this statement altogether by declaring I, 104, 105:

"If there is not to be found the wonderful genius, which is connected with impressions from preceding births, then, notwithstanding, the $v\bar{a}c$ (Goddess of Speech) presents some favour, when worshipped by scholarship and effort.

Therefore those who strive for fame should put aside idleness and continually and intensively serve the Goddess of Speech. Even if there is but small talent for poetry a man who shows energy can enjoy.

⁶ The vṛtti runs: bahu anekaṃ chandovyākaraṇakoṣa-kalācaturvargagajaturagakhaḍgādilakṣaṇātmakam ity arthaḥ. Nirmalaṃ sadupadeśena niḥsandehamadhigatya samyak-pariśīlitam ity arthaḥ. Premacandra has taken the first part from the commentary of the Kāvyaprakāśa.

⁷ Commentary: kāvyaj hopadesena paunahpunyena pravrttih.

himself in the company of the learned ones,"

These statements illustrate very lucidly the manner of Dandin's polemic against Bhāmaha. Also with respect to things about which there should not be a doubt and which are acknwledged by all the later writers on alamkāra the author of the Kāvyādaréa presents a view opposite to that of Bhāmaha. This oppostion seems to have its last reason in some personal dislike against a rival.

The matter is treated much more exhaustively by Vāmana. His words are not without a certain originality. General reflections about the kavi open the second adhyāya of the first book. Vāmana knows two sorts of poets:

arocakinah satrnābhyavahārinas ca kavayah

"There are poets who suffer from want of appetite and there are poets who eat even grass."8

As the vrtti explains, these terms are used in a metaphorical sense. The first group of poets is very difficult to please in all that appertains to poetics. Composing a $k\bar{a}vya$ they proceed with the greatest diligence. They discriminate accurately between what is fit and what is not fit. The second group, on the other hand, does not differentiate good from bad. In other words: the one is vivekin, and the other avivekin (discriminating and not discriminating).10 Only the former class of poets are worth being instructed on account of their being endowed with the ability of discriminating (I, 2, 2: purve śisyā vivekitvāt), whilst the other should not be instructed, because they cannot discriminate (I. 2. 3: netare tadviparyayāt). 11 The śāstra is not made for all: for the second group of poets it will be of no advantage (I. 2, 4: na šāstram adravyesu arthavat). as the nut which is employed for clarifying muddy water is by no means able to clarify a swamp (I, 2, 5: na katakam pahkaprasādanāya). 12

⁸ In Rājašekhara's Kāvyamīmāmsā these words are attributed to an author Mangala by name. We read (p. 14): "te ca dvidhā' rocakinah satṛṇābhyavahāriṇas ca" iti Mangalah. "kavayo' pi bhavanti' iti Vāmanīyāh. . . . "tatra vivekinah pūrve tadviparītās tu tatonantarāh" iti Vāmanīvāh. Nothing is known with regard to this Mangala, nor can I find his name in any of the works of the ālaṃkārikas. Two verses of his are quoted in the Saduktikarṇāmṛta, p. 290, as is shown by the editor of the Kāvyamīṇāṃsā.

⁹ arocakisatrnābhyavahārisabdau gaņārthau.

The so-called kāvyakaraņa is the subject of the third adhyāya of the same book. We meet the same subjects which are with but slight variations dealt with by all ālaṃkārikas. Vāmana calls them kāvyāngas. There are, he says, three kāvyāngas: the world

- 10 ko' sāv arthaḥ? vivekitvam avivekitvam iti.
- 11 tadviparyayād avivecanaśīlatvāt.
- 12 With the nut of the kataka tree the sides of vessels were rubbed, by which procedure the unclean elements of the water were said to segregate on the sides. Cf. Manu vi, 67:

phalam katakavrksasya yady apy ambuprasadakam, na nāmagrahaņād eva tasya vāri prasīdati.

Kālidāsa mentions the kataka nut in a simile in his Mālavikāgnimitra II. 8:

mando' py amandatām eti saṃsargeṇa vipaścitaḥ, paṅkacchidaḥ phalasyeva nikaṣeṇāvilaṃ payaḥ. It is often spoken of, too, in the works on medicine. (loka), the sciences (vidyās), and matters of various kinds (prakīrna).

It need not be proved that the stories told in the poem must be probable or possible, that they must agree with the rules valid for this world (I, 3, 2: lokavrtam lokah).

Then, the poet must possess the knowledge of the sciences, which are enumerated in I, 3, 3:

śabdasmṛtyabhidhānakośacchandovicitikalākāmaśāstradaṇḍanītipurvā vidyāḥ.

"These are the sciences: grammar, dictionary, prosody, the doctrines of the arts, the doctrine of love, the doctrine of politics, and others."

Sabdasmṛti is identical with vyākaraṇa. From the grammar the poet learns the correctness of speech (4: śabdasmṛteḥ śabdaśuddhiḥ).¹³

The dictionary gives security with regard to the sense (5: abhidhānakośāt padārthaniścayah).

The doctrine of prosody takes away the doubts which arise regarding metre (6: chandoviciter vrtta-samsayacchedah). 14

The kalāśāstras give information about the arts (7: kalāśāstrebhyaḥ kalātattvasya saṃvit). The vṛtti mentions singing (gīta), dancing (nṛtya), painting ¹³ ŝabdasmṛteḥ vyākaraṇāt ŝabdānāṃ ŝuddhiḥ śādhutvaniŝcayaḥ kartavyaḥ.

¹⁴ In the Kāvyādarśa (I. 12) and the Kāvyamīmāṇsā the term prosody is also rendered by the word chandoviciti, and in other works one will find the same. Therefore the hypothesis, according to which the term chandoviciti in the Kāvyādarśa does not denote prosody generally, but a work thereon, composed by Daṇḍin, is incorrect.

(citra). Apparantly there existed compendiums with regard to the arts referred to.

From the kāmaśāstra one gets the knowledge of the usages respecting love (8: kāmaśāstrataḥ kāmopacārasya [saṃvit]).

The compendium of politics which by the vrtti is named arthaśāstra¹⁵ shows in which cases the sixfold way in foreign affairs should be adopted or avoided (9: dandanīter nayāpanayayoḥ [samvit]).¹⁶ The knowledge of the arthaśāstra is of importance, because the intrigues of the plot are founded upon it.¹⁷

In I, 3, 11 we are told which matters are included in the subject prakirna.

"(Under) Miscellaneous matters (must be understood) knowledge of examples, practice, reverence for the masters, careful examination, talent, and close attention."

Knowledge of examples is intimate acquaintance with the already existing kāvyas (12: tatra kāvyaparicayo lakṣyajñatvam). 18

- 15 The Arthaśāstra by Kautilya is very likely meant.
- 16 tatra sadgunyasya yathavat prayogo nayah tadviparito' panayah nahi tav avijñaya nayakapratinayakayor vṛttam sakyam kavye nibandhum.
- 17 Vṛttiḥ: itihāsādiḥ itivṛttaṇ kāvyaśarīraṇ tasya kuṭilatvaṇ tato daṇḍanīteḥ ābalīyasādiprayogavyutpattimūlatvāt tasyāḥ.—This, in the first place, is valid for the drama, but it has already been mentioned before that the theories of the drama were to a great extent transferred to the kāvya in the widest sense of the word.
- 18 anyeşām kāvyeşu paricayo lakşyajñatvam. tato hi kāvyabandhasya vyutpattir bhavati.

Abhiyoga is the practice which is to be gained if one, by way of trial, composes $k\bar{a}vyas$, or, at least, fragments of a $k\bar{a}vya$ (13: $k\bar{a}vyabandhodyamo'$ bhiyogah).

Reverence for the masters is the willing obedience to the teachers, when they give instruction with regard to $k\bar{a}vya$ (14: $k\bar{a}vyopadeśaguruśuśrūṣaṇaṃ vrddhasevā$).

Avekṣaṇa is the exact examination, whether a certain word should be used or not (15: padādhāno-ddharaṇam avekṣaṇm).

In commenting upon this $s\bar{u}tra$ Vāmana also mentions another term, $k\bar{u}vyap\bar{u}ka$ which is of more importance than appears at first sight. The author says:

"As long as the mind is uncertain, (the process of) taking or avoiding (of words) exists: but when a word is absolutly fixed, then speech is complete.

When the words have come to that state that they no longer admit of being altered, then this is called Ripeness of words by those who are expert in the employment of words (in compositions)."19

Vāmana mentions $k\bar{a}vyap\bar{a}ka$ a second time, at the end of the third adhikaraṇa, which contains the definition of the guṇ as. He quotes three verses ($atra slok\bar{a}h$); the first two are the following:

"When the gunas are entirely clear, one speaks of ripeness of the $k\bar{a}vya$; and it is compared with the ripeness of the mango.

¹⁹ This is quoted in Rajasekhara's Kavyamīmamsa with some variations. See Below.

A $k\bar{a}vya$ which is endowed with correctly formed nouns and verbs, but where the gunas of the sense are bad, is like the ripe $vrnt\bar{a}ka$ fruit: people dislike it."

This ripeness of $k\bar{a}vya$ we will meet again later on, when we deal with what Rajasekhara has to say on the nature of the poet. Here we only wish to draw attention to the fact that $k\bar{a}vyap\bar{a}ka$ is never mentioned in one of $V\bar{a}mana's s\bar{u}tras$, but only in the verses of the commentary. It is a matter of interest that the vrti goes a good deal farther than the explanation of the $s\bar{u}tras$ requires.

Talent is the germ of poetry (16: kavitvabījaṃ pratibhānam). This pratibhāna (which, of course, is identical with the pratibhā of Bhāmaha) is an inborn talent and a mental impression, the last cause of which lies in a former existence. With regard to this definition Vāmana appears to be influenced by Kāvyādarśa II, 104. Without the pratibhāna literary composition cannot be produced, or, if a man nevertheless tries to do so, the effect will only be ridiculous 20

By avadhāna the attention is meant which is directed to the one and only end, the faultless perfection of a kāvya (17: cittaikāgryam avadhānam).²¹

²⁰ kavitvasya bījam kavitvabījam janmāntarāgatasamskāravišesah kašcit. yasmād vinā kāvyam na nispadyate nispannam vāvahāsāyatanam syāt.

²¹ cittasyaikāgryam bāhyārthanivṛttiḥ tad avadhānam. avahitam hi cittam arthān pasyati. Cf. Kāvyamīmāṃsā p. 11: manasa ekāgratā samādhiḥ. samāhitam cittam arthān Pasyati.

To these definitions the following sūtras give some supplementary explanations, which are of some interest on account of their originality: Vāmana declares that the perfect attention depends on two things: place and time (18: tad [avadhānam] deśakā-lābhyām). The most suitable way for the composition of a kāvya is to do it in loneliness (19: vivikto deśah), the most suitable time is the fourth (the last) part of the night (20: rātriyāmas turīyah kālah), that is according to our idea, the early morning. The commentary Kāmadhenu refers to a couple of passages in the kāvyas: Kālidāsa says in Raghuvamša xvii, 1:

paścimād yāminīyāmāt prasādam iva cetanā, and Māgha in Śiśupālavadha II. 6: gahanam apararātraprāptabuddhiprasādāḥ, kayaya iva mahīpāś cintayanty arthajātam.

Comparing the words of Vāmana with those of his predecessors it appears that the author depends on Bhāmaha. This one, however, is new, namely, that the points the knowledge of which is necesseary for the poet are considered under three headings: loka, vidyā, and prakīrņa. This subdivision, however, is by no means good, for the most important point, the pratibhāna, which should be named in the first place, is enumerated under the miscellanea, as if it were something subordinate, though Vāmana himself holds the pratibhā to be the very germ of poetry. We need not be astonished that this division of Vāmana's is not referred to in later works on alamkāra.

The various points are, as mentioned before, for the greater part the same as those which Bhamaha considered necessary to anyone who wishes to become a good kavi. Bhāmaha had also taught that the poet must be familiar with wordly business (loka); that knowledge of the grammar (Bhāmaha: śabda, Vāmana: śabdasmrti), of dictionaries (abhidhānārtha, abhidhānakośa), of prosody (chandas, chandoviciti), of the arts (kalā) must be assumed for the kavi. The sciences of love (kāmašāstra) and of politics (dandanīti, or, as it is called in the vrtti, arthasastra) are added by Vamana. Among the points mentioned under the title prakīrņa Vāmana's lakṣyajñatva corresponds to Bhāmaha's vilokyānyanibandhān: abhiyoga to kāvyakriyādarah: vrddhasevā to krtvā tadvidupāsanām; aveksaņa to the idea expressed by Bhāmaha in I, 11. Pratibhāna is the same as pratibhā. Knowing very well that poetry is only possible when there is pratibhā, Bhāmaha opens his discussions with this point. Though Vamana is of the same opinion with regard to pratibhā, because he calls it the germ of poetry, he mentions this most important factor only by the way, as it were, under the title of prakirna. The avadhana, which Vāmana then speaks of is not mentioned by Bhāmaha, but it is not very different from avekṣaṇa. On the other hand, we do not find Bhāmaha's yukti nor his itihāsāśrayāh kathāh in Vāmana's sūtra, which last subject is of still more importance. In the vrtti to sūtra 10, however, these kathās are considered by Vāmana as kāvyašarīra; so they are not, strictly speaking, a kāraņa for the poet, but for the foundations of the kāvya itself.

The ideas of Vāmana only rarely met with acknowledgment by the later writers on poetics, who more or less dealt with the matter in a way similar to Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin. Ud bhata in his book on the alaṃkāras has no occasion to touch this fundamental question, but Rudrata refers to the Kāvyādarša, when he declares in the Kāvyādarša I, 14:

tasyāsāranirāsāt sāragrahaņāc ca cāruņah karaņe, tritayam idam vyāpriyate śaktir vyutpattir abhyāsah.

"To avoid the unbeautiful and to take the beautiful there must be these three things for the compositions of a good $(k\bar{a}vya)$: talent, scholarship, and practice."

These terms śakti, vyutpatti, and ablyāsa are apparently chosen only for the reason that he does not wish to copy Dandin verbatim.

In I, 15 we are informed as to what must be understood by $\acute{s}akti$:

manasi sadā susamādhini visphuraņam anekadhābhidheyasya, aklistāni padāni ca vibhānti yasyām asau saktih.

"When in a well-concentrated mind many ways, ideas, and words, which are not worn out, spring forth, it is called śakti."

Thus śakti is but another word for pratibhā, which is used in the Kāvyādarśa. It seems, however, that Rudrata in the term śakti includes a little more than the mere pratibhā, or poetical talent, namely also some thing contained in 'śruta', for śakti does not refer only to the idea or the sense (abhidheya) which the poet whishes to express, but also to the bearer of the idea, the word. That in this connection pada is synonymous with $\hat{s}abda$ and does not mean the sentence $(v\bar{a}kya)$ is shown by its standing in contrast to adhidheya. In the following stanzas the quality of $\hat{s}akti$ is illustrated:

pratibhety aparair uditā sahajotpādyā ca sā dvidhā bhavati, puṃsā saha jātatvād anayos tu jyāyasī sahajā.

svasyāsau samskāre param aparam mṛgayate yato hetum, utpādyā tu kathamcid vyutpattyā janyate parayā.

"The \acute{sakti} , named by others as $pratibh\bar{a}$, is two-fold; innate and to be acquired. Among these two sorts the innate (\acute{sakti}) is the better one on account of its being produced together with the man.

For that (innate śakti) only seeks for its further accomplishment another cause; but the second śakti is with some difficulty to be produced only by the highest accomplishment itself."

Thereby the author wishes to say that the innate śakti, though through the samskāra existing as such, must yet undergo in some way or another a certain development from outside, if it is to be useful for the special purpose of composing a kāvya. This is in accordance with the above stated fact that in Rudrata's śakti something which strictly belongs to the term 'śruta' is already contained. The second kind of śakti, on the other hand, being not yet in existence, must be produced and has thus to seek a primary cause.

Apparently the mode of Rudrata's treatment of the sakti is an attampt to remove the inaccuracy with which the pratibhā is dealt with in the Kāvyādarša. The naisargikī pratibhā of Dandin is of course the same as the sahajā šakti of Rudrata, and cannot thus be substituted by another element as is done in the Kāvyādarśa I. 104, 105. Thus the sahajā śakti is set in contrast by Rudrata to the utpādya śakti. Strictly speaking, however, Rudrata is no more right than Daṇḍin. The matter in question is treated in a satisfactory way only by Bhāmaha. Vyutpatti is thus defined by Rudrata, I, 18; 19:

"Vyutpatti, in the more limited sense, is the correct distinction between what is suitable and what is not suitable, on account of the knowledge of prosody, grammar, the arts, worldly business, the word, and the sense of the word.

But in the wider sense, is there anything to be found in the world at all, whether that should be expressed (the word), which may not become an element of the $k\bar{a}vy\alpha$? Therefore this (vyutpatti) in the wider sense) is the knowledge of everything."

Only an illustration, not a definition, is given with regard to the third question, the abhyāsa;²² I. 20:

"A learned and talented man should, after having studied all branches of human understanding, under the guidance of a good poet and an expert man continually, by day and night, practise (the composition of) the kāvya."

As Rudrata is wholly influenced by his predecessors, so also Mammata presents no new ideas in saying.

"Talent ($\dot{s}akti$), exprience ($nipunat\bar{a}$) with respect to the world, the $\dot{s}\bar{a}stra$, the $k\bar{a}vyas$, etc., and practice ($abhy\bar{a}sa$) based upon the instruction (by a teacher) who is expert in the $k\bar{a}vya$, are the (three) causes for a $k\bar{a}vya$ "

²² Namisādhu: abhyāso lokaprasiddha eva.

Sakti, which term is apparently taken from the Kāvyālamkāra of Rudrata, is again identified with Bhāmaha's pratibhā. It may be considered, says the author in the commentary, as the germ of kavitva, without which nobody is able to compose a kāvya, if he does not wish to produce something to be laughed at²³. This last note Mammata has borrowed from Vāmana²⁴.

Nipuṇatā comprises the knowledge of all the poet should understand, as the business of the world, prosody, grammar, the dictionary, the arts, the so-called caturvarga (dharma, artha, kāma, mokṣa), the śāstras, which deal with elephants, horses, chariots, weapons etc. Finally one must be well acquainted with the kāvyas already in existence²⁵.

Supposing he is in possession of both śakti and nipuṇatā, the disciple has, under the direction of a well-versed teacher, to practise composing kāvyas.

To show in which way the later ālaṃkārikas vary old and sanctioned ideas, the definitions and explanations of the older Vāgbhaṭā (12th century) may be given (Vāgbhaṭālaṃkāra I, 3ff).

"The (innate) fancy (pratibhā) is the cause of the kāvya, scholarship (vyutpatti) (is) its ornament, and practice (abhyāsa) causes productiveness, so the first kavis have said."

- 23 Mammatasays in his commentary: śaktih kavitvabijarūpah saṃskāravišesah yaṃ vinā kāvyaṃ na prasaret prasrtaṃ vā upahasanīyaṃ syāt.

 24 Cf. above p. 52.
- 25 lokasya sthāvarajangamātmakalokavṛttasya śāstrāṇāṃ chandovyākaraṇābhidhānakośakalācaturvargagajaturagakhaḍgādilakṣaṇagranthānāṃ kāvyānāṇ ca mahākavinibandhānām.

(PRATIBHA)

"The (innate) fancy of the good poet, which lets the use of clear²⁶ words be well understood and gives birth to a new tenor, is called pratibhā which is all pervading."

(VYUTPATTI)

"The unique, tradition based knowledge of the system, of words, of (the trivarga) dharma²⁷, artha, and kāma, of politics²⁸, of love, etc., is named vyutpatti."

(ABHYASA)

"The assiduous devotion, which by the aid of the teachers is to be manifested with respect to the arrangement of a $k\bar{a}vya$, is called $abhy\bar{a}sa$. A way whereby one can come to it will now be told.

With a series of words which (by form) sustains the beauty of the structure, but has not yet any (new) tenor, one can make oneself acquainted with all sorts of metre with the view of employing them in the kāvya.

Through combinations (of sounds) one should form a length at the end of the word, one should not suppress the visargas, one should avoid bad sandhis; these are the ways which produce the beauty of the structure."

The making of heavy vowels by conjuncture with the following word perfects, says the commentary, a stability of the structure and the visargas produce the guna called ojas.

- 26 The commentary explains prasanna by aklista,
- 27 Commentary: dharmaśāstram āgamaḥ.
- 28 Commentary: arthasāstram Cāņakyapranīto rājanītigranthah.

Vāgbhaţa gives the following examples: site kṛpāṇe vidhṛte tvayā ghore raṇe kṛte, nradhīśa kṣitipā bhītyā vana eva gatā javāt.

"O king, when in the horrible battle you draw your sword, then the enemies run from fear quickly into the forest."

There we have the above mentioned faults: the words stand there one by one, so that the structure becomes very loose. The harshness can be avoided, if the poet would produce heavy syllables by contractions. Further the visurga in kṣitipā is suppressed. If it were not, (by placing after kṣitipā another word than bhītyā) then the guṇa ojas, in this very case of a peculiar effect, would be taking place. Finally a bad (though no false) sandhi lies in nradhītāa,

Now Vāgbhaṭa speaks of the tenor:

"If the construction of a new tenor will not succeed because the pupil does not possess enough experience as yet, he should endeavour also in the conversations to become able to find out a new tenor," 29

After having illustrated this statement with an example, the author touches the question of borrowing from other poets.

"Forming the poetical combination of the tenor of the compositions of other poets may be (some sort of) exercise. It is, however, not very fair, because the poet thereby becomes a thief.

29 arthasamkalanātattvam arthasya abhidheyasya samkalanātattvam samghatanārahasyam padyabandhavidhilakṣaṇam samkathāsv api parasparālāpesv apy abhyasyet.

Only in the $samasy\bar{a}^{30}$ the borrowing from other $k\bar{a}vyas$ becomes a merit rather for the poet, for then he produces a new tenor, which combines with the tenor of the (prior poem)."

To some other things, which are of advantage to the poet, the author draws attention in the next stanza:

manaḥprasattili pratibli prataḥkālo' bhiyogitā, anekaśāstradarśitvam ity arthālokahetavaļi.

"Clearness of mind, fancy, early morning, practice, acquaintance with the numerous $\bar{a}stras$: these are the causes for finding the tenor."

The term $pr\bar{a}ta\hbar k\bar{a}la$ shows the influence of Vāmana, but with the exception of that the old trinity $pratibh\bar{a}$, vyutpatti, and $abhy\bar{a}sa$ is preserved, the words vyutpatti and $abhy\bar{a}sa$ being taken, probably, from the $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}lamk\bar{a}ra$ of Rudrata.

Rājašekhara deals very exhaustively with the matter in question in his Kāvyamīmāṃšā. Only some of his ideas can be stated here. According to him there are two sorts of disciples: the buddhimat and the āhāryabuddhi. These terms appear to have been borrowed from Kauṭilya's Arthašāstra³¹. The buddhimat is a man whose mind of itself follows the sāstra (yasya nisarqataḥ śāstram anudhāvati buddhiḥ saḥ buddhimān), whilst the buddhi of the āhāryabuddhi is educated by the occupation with the sāstra (yasya ca sāstrābhyāsaḥ saṃskurute buddhim asāv ³⁰ A sort of poetry where the poet has to complete a stanza the beginning of which is given.

³¹ I,17: buddhimān āhāryabuddhir, durbuddhir iti punaravisesah, āhāryabuddhiķ). The buddhi is of three kinds: referring to smṛti (remembrance of past things), to mati (understanding of present things), and to prajāā (knowledge of future things). This threefold buddhi is the helper (upakartrī) of the kavi. The main peculiarity of both the buddhimat and the āhāryabuddhi is the devotion to a good teacher (sugurūpāsanā).

When anyone composes a kāvya, then, in the opinion of Syāmadeva, ss says Rājasékhara, the poet's samādhi i.e. the concentration of the mind of one subject (ekāgratā) begins to work, but according to Mangala³⁴ the abhyāsa, or uninterrupted practice must be considered as the chief requisite for the poet. Abhyāsa is defined as avicchedena śīlanam. The author of the Kāvyamīmāmsā replies that samādhi is the interior and abhyāsa the exterior effort, and that these two together bring the śakti (the active power) into prominence (udbhāsayalah), and this śakti is the sole source of poetry.

Then the author explains the relation between sakti on the one, and pratibhā and vyutpatti on the other hand. The two functions, or objects of pratibhā and vyutpatti, have the sakti as their agens or subject³⁴). In other words: only if there is sakti, sişymäno dharmärthäv upalabhate cānutiṣṭhati ca buddhimän. upalabhamäno nänutiṣṭhaty āhāryabuddiḥ, apāyanityo dharmärthaveṣī ceti durbuddhiḥ.

³² Nothing is known about this writer on alamkara,

³³ Another unknown ālaṃkārika.

³⁴ saktikartrke hi pratibhāvyutpattikarmaņī.

pratibhā, and vyutpatti then a kāvya can be produced³⁵. From this it becomes clear that in the opinion of Rājašekhara šakti and pratibhā are two quite different things and not synonyms, as is the case in Rudrata's Kāvyālaṃkāra, and this idea of Rājašekhara seems to be a new one³⁶.

The author defines the pratibhā as follows:

"Pratibhā is the (agens) which in a pleasant way makes the richness in words, the affluence of sense, the system of alamkāras, the diction, and other things of this kind appear."

For anybody who does not possess $pratibh\bar{a}$ the richness in words becomes invisible, but for the man who is endowed with it word and sense stand before his very eyes, as it were, even if he be blind³⁷. The great poets, too, do not only see the things of this world about them, but with their intellectual eye see other countries, other continents, and are enabled to describe the deeds of the heroes of $kath\bar{a}s$. Then follow some illustrations taken from Kālidāsa's works³⁸).

³⁵ The author says śaktasya pratibhā śaktaś ca vyutpadyate.

³⁶ That the term śakti was employed also by other scholars beside Rudraţa as a synonym of pratibhā is said by Rājaśekhara himself, on p. 16 of his work. After having quoted a stanza from the Dhvanyāloka, where śakti means "genius," the author says: śaktiśaktaś cāyam upacaritah pratibhāne varttate: "the word śakti is here used metaphorically for pratibhāna."

³⁷ As in the case of Medhāvirudra (without doubt the famous writer on poetics, who is referred to already by Bhāmaha) and Kumāradāsa (yato Medhāvirudra-Kumāradāsādayo jātyandhāḥ kavayaḥ śrūyante).

³⁸ Rājašekhara illustrates deśāntaravyavahāra, dvīpāa-taravyavahāra, kathāpurusavyavahāra; he gives another ex-

Pratibhā has a twofold aspect, being kārayitrī and bhāvayitrī. This division though not be found in any of the older ālaṃkārika's works, must have been discussed in a similar way before Rājaśekhara, as the author in his further explanations mentions the views of other scholars, among whom Śyāmadeva is quoted by name.

The former term (kārayitrī) can be translated by "creative," but it is difficult to find an English equivlent as regards the latter. We may render it provisionally by "discriminative" 59. This classification implies a difference between kavitva and lhāvikatva 40).

Regarding the former kind of pratibhā, Rājaśe-khara says (p. 12: kaver upakurvānā kārayitrī) "the creative pratibhā helps the poet." It helps the poet when occupied with the composition of the kāvya, its structure, its embellishment, and every thing which is connected with it. Kārayitrī, then, refers to the outer part of the work. This pratibhā

- 39 This is the rendering by Dr. De, who has been kind enough to give me very valuable explanations concerning Rājaśekhara's treatment of Kāravitrī and bhāvayitrī, in a letter dated Nov. 23rd 1922.
- 40 Dr. De draws my attention to the fact, that this distinction (Kavitva and bhāvakatva) has a resemblance to that between Imagination and Fancy made by the early 19th century Romantic critics in England. Consequently the terms Kārayitrī and bhāvayitrī can also be rendered by "imaginative" and "fanciful."

ample to illustrate the ādi of deśadvīpāntarakathāpuruṣādi. The examples are respectively from Śakuntalā VII, 42; Raghuvaṃśa VI, 57; Kumārasaṃbhava III, 67; Raghuvaṃśa VI, 82.

is also threefold: sahajā (innate), āhārhā (to be grasped), and aupadešikī (to be taught). The first comes from another existence and has need of only small cultivation in the present birth; the second is based, too, on former existence, but requires great cultivation in the present existence and becomes manifest by practice in this birth; the third can be acquired only by instruction from mantra and tantra etc., in this world⁴¹. It need not be pointed out that Vāmana's and Daṇḍin's ideas turn up here, though not in the old form, because also the bhāvayitrī pratibhā was meant by those scholars.

With reference to this trinity Rājašekhara declares that there are three sorts of poets (kavi), who are called sārasvata, ābhāsaka, and aupadešika. This trinity, again, refers to the above described three kinds of kavi, viz. buddhimat, āhāryabuddhimat, and durbuddhi. It is evident that the sārasvatakavi is the best poet.

The latter kind of pratibhā is called bhāvayitrī, with regard to which Rājaśekhara says:

bhāvakasyopakurvāņā bhāvayitrī. sā hi kaveņ śramam abhiprāyam ca bhāvayati.

"The discriminative pratibhā helps the discrimination, for it brings into effect the poet's effort and intention."

In other words, this pratibhā helps the poet's

⁴¹ Janmantarasamskārāpeksinī sahajā, janmasamskārayonirāhāryā, mantratanatrādyupadeśaprabhavā aupadeśikī. aihikena kiyatāpi samskāreņa prathamām tām sahajeti vyapadišanti, mahatā punarāhāryā. aupadeśikyāh punar aihika eva upadeśkālah, aihika eva samskārakālah.

thinking, imagination, or intention⁴², whilst the former helps him in the act of composing the kāvya. Kārayitrī, then, refers to the outer part of the work, whilst bhāvayitrī has nothing to do with outward forms, whatever they may be, but creates the inner value of the poem from within. "Through this bhāvayitrī pratibhā," the author continues, "the poet's tree of work becomes fruitful, otherwise it would be barren."⁴³.

There are, however, some scholars who do not acknowledge the distinction between $k\bar{a}rayitr\bar{\imath}$ and $hh\bar{a}vayitr\bar{\imath}$, because the kavi is a $bh\bar{a}vaka$, and the $bh\bar{a}vaka$ is a $kavi;^{44}$ and they say:

pratibhātāratamyena pratisthā bhuvi bhūridhā, bhāvakas tu kavih prāyo na bhajaty adhamām dasām.

"In the world stability (of fame) is of many kinds according to the degree of pratibhā. The bhāvaka, however, being a poet, generally does not occupy an inferior position."

"No, says Kālidāsa, the state of a bhāvaka is different from the state of a kavi, and the state of a kavi from the state of a bhāvaka, on account of a difference in their nature as well as their scope. It is said:

One is able to compose words (a $k\bar{a}vya$), the other only to hear them. Your intelligence, fortunate in both cases, makes us wonder. For, in one object there are not met with all excellent qualities toge-

- 42 It produces the "Sohanen," as the German term would be.
- 43 tayā khalu phalitah kaver vyāpāratarur anyathā so vakešī syāt.
 - 44 Dr. De would prefer bhāvuka instead of bhāvaka ther: one stone produces the gold, the other is able to test it."

After having pointed out that the bhāvaka need not necessarily be a kavi at the same time, and that therefore a strict distinction between both kavi and bhāvaka should be made Rājašekara goes on to deal with the bhāvaka. He says:

"The (bhāvakas) are of two kinds, those who suffer from want of appetite (arocakinah), and those who eat even grass (satṛṇābhyavahāriṇah), says Mangala. The kavis, too, says Vāmana. The (bhāvakas) are really of four kinds, says Yāyāvara, because they are matsarin (envious) and tattvābhiniveśin (turning the mind to the truth) besides."

Then matsarins are rare, but the tattvābhinivešins are much rarer still. We shall, however, not treat the matter further here, as these statements of Rāja-sekhara are of no great importance, being nothing more than some enlargements of the above described ideas of Vāmana.

After having dealt with the most important postulate for the kavi, the twofold pratibhā, Rājaśekhara continues the subject in the fifth adhyāya by speaking of vyutpatti.

The masters have said, the author begins, that vyutpatti is the state of one who knows many things (bahujñatā). According to Rājašekhara, however, vyutpatti is the exact discrimination between what is suitable and what is not suitable (ucitānucitaviveka).

Now there arises the question: is pratibhā or vyutpatti the better? In the opinion of Ānanda⁴⁵

⁴⁵ Anandavardhana. It is the only case where he is it is pratibhā, because it hides a fault which may spring from the poet's non-vyutpatti, and:

avyutpattikṛto doṣaḥ śaktyā saṃvriyate kaveḥ, yas tv aśaktikṛtas tasya jhag ity evāvbhāsate46.

"A fault of the poet arisen from his non-vyutpatti is concealed by (the poet's) śakti⁴7; But a fault which is caused by the poet's non-śakti is obvious at first sight."

Mangala, on the contrary, holds vyutpatti to be better, because vyutpatti wholly conceals a fault which the poet makes by not possessing pratibhā. Rājašekhara endeavours to reconciliate these contrary views by declaring that both pratibhā and vyutpatti must come together, and, when united, are both better (pratibhāvyutpattī mithah samavete šreyasyau).

After this brilliant "correction" of the masters' view Rājasekhara pursues the subject a little further: One who is endowed with pratibhā and vyutpatti is called "kavi", and there are three sorts of kavi: śāstrakavi, kāvyakavi, and ubhayakavi. According to the opinion of Syāmadeva, the kāvyakavi is better than the śāstrakavi, and ubhayakavi better referred to by name by Rajasekhara, and is important as regards chronology.

46 Dhvanyālokalocana, uddyota iii to verse 6 (p. 137 in the edition of Kāvyamālā No. 25).

avyutpattikṛto doṣaḥ śaktyā saṃvriyate kaveḥ, yas tv aśaktikṛtas tasya sa jhaṭity avabhāsate.

By the quotation of this stanza under the name of Ānanda (vardhana) every doubt about the authorship of the vitti is set aside.

47 The term sakti is used here in the sense of pratibhāna. Rājasekhara says: saktisabdas cāyam upacaritah pratibhāne varttate.

than both $\bar{a}\sitesiatra\cdot\ and $k\bar{a}vyakavi\,\ which R\bar{a}\ja\siekhara\ denies, saying that in their own domain everyone of the three must be considered as the better, "as the $r\bar{a}jahamsa\ \ \text{is not qualified to drink the beams of the moon nor the $cakora\ \text{to distinguish milk from water."} The $\bar{a}\sitesiatrakavi\,\ \text{according to his special education in the $\bar{a}\sitestatrakavi\,\ \text{according to his special education in the $\bar{a}\sitestatrakavi\,\ \text{according to his special education in the $\bar{a}\sitestatra\text{ava}\,\ \text{"tears asunder ($vicchinatti\)" the plenty of $rasa\ \text{in the $k\bar{a}vya\text{a}\,\ \text{whilst the $k\bar{a}vyakavi\ "loosens"} the sense by the splendour ($vaicitrya\) of the diction ($ukti\), even if it is hardly to be understood by logic. The $ubhayakavi\,\ \text{as a matter of course, is better than the two others, supposing that he is well versed both in $\bar{a}\sitetatra\ \text{and $k\bar{a}vya\text{a}\,\ \text{and $k\bar{a}vyakavi\ help one to the other.} The author warns against being partial $\frac{4}{8}\.

Regarding the two sorts of kavi: $\tilde{a}stra-\text{ and }k\tilde{a}vya-kavi, R\tilde{a}jasekhara goes still farther, making divisions of both. This division is of no great interest and shows more the author's pedantry than any progress in poetical matters. While the $\tilde{a}strakavi$ is threefold (the first composes a $\tilde{a}stra,$ the second arranges a $k\tilde{a}vya$ in the $\tilde{a}stras,$ and the third puts down the sense or tenor of the $\tilde{a}stra$ on the $k\tilde{a}vya$) there are eight groups of the $k\tilde{a}vyakavi: 1st. the $racan\tilde{a}-kavi;$ he attends especially to the sounds. 2nd. the $\tilde{a}bdakavi;$ of whom again there are three sorts, viz. the $n\tilde{a}makavi,$ the $\tilde{a}khy\tilde{a}takavi$ and the $n\tilde{a}m\tilde{a}khy\tilde{a}ta-kavi,$ who chiefly employ nouns, or verbs, or nouns and verbs respectively. 3rd. the $arthakavi;$ he is devoted to the manifoldness of sense. 4th. the alamkārakavi (two sorts); he likes to show sabda- and arthālamkāras. 5th. the uktikavi; he demonstrates elegance of expression. 6th. the rasakavi; his strength lies in the rasa. 7th, the māraakavi: he respects peculiarly the styles (rīti). 8th. the sāstrakavi; he manifests cleverness in scholarly matters. It need not be said that these divisions have scarcely any value in themselves, and therefore we will not give the examples the author quotes to illustrate the different kinds of poets. The sorts of poet named above are again divided into three kinds, the kanīyas, the madhuama, and the mahākavi according to whether they use only two or three, about five, or all quass. The author then speaks of the ten conditions of the kavi, but we will not pursue the matter further here 49

⁴⁸ yac chāstrasaṃskāraḥ kāvyam anugṛhṇāti śāstraikapravaṇatā tu nigṛhṇāti, kavyasaṃskāro' pi śāstravākyapākam anuruṇaddhi Kāvyaikaprayaṇatā tu viruṇaddhi.

Finally Rājašekhara mentions $abhy\bar{a}sa$, but mainly to deal with another subject, the $p\bar{a}ka$. He says that on account of practice $(abhy\bar{a}sa)$ the good poet's speech becomes "ripe $(p\bar{a}ka)$ ". As to the definition of $p\bar{a}ka$ there are different views (Mangala calls it $parin\bar{a}ma$, and $parin\bar{a}ma$ is in his opinon the correctness regarding nouns and verbs⁵¹). This, however, is not right. This last is identical with sauśabdya⁵². According to other scholars pāka is a firmness in the employment of the words (padaniveśaniskampatā). Here Rājašekhara quotes a stanza which we find in Vāmana's Kāvyālaṃkārasūtravṛtti 1, 3, 15⁵³. Then the author mentions a similar opinion of the school of Vāmana (Vāmanīyāḥ), and quotes the second verse in the vṛtti to Vāmana 1, 3, 15⁵⁴. This, however, is also not correct, because this sort of pāka according to Avantisundarī (Rājašekhara's wife) is nothing else than aśakti.

⁴⁹ Under these new classes we find a mahākavi again, and besides him a kavirāja.

⁵⁰ Satatam abhyāsavasatah sukaveh vākyam pākam āvāti.

^{51 &}quot;Kaḥ punar ayaṇ pariṇāmah" ity ācāryāḥ, "Supāṇ tinām ca śravaḥ saiṣā vyutpattiḥ. The term śrava is a little strange. Is it the hearing of the (correctly formed) nouns and verbs?

In the opinion of Rājasekhara's wife ripeness exists in such cases, where the very same subject is expressed in many ways and illustrated by the $mah\bar{a}kavis$. In other words, when a poetical composition is endowed with the rasa, then indeed, it is $p\bar{a}ka^{5\,5}$. $P\bar{a}ka$ therefore is far from being a quality of words, its province is rather the sense or the idea, or, still better, the way the sense communicates itself to the hearer. Rājasekhara renders the view of his wife in the following lines:

"This is in my opinion ripeness of expression (vākyapāka) whereby the guṇas, the alamkāras, the ⁵² Bhāmaha I, 14. 53 See above p. 51.

^{54 &}quot;āgrahaparigrahād api padasthairyaparyavasāyas tasmāt padānām parivṛttivaimukyam pākaḥ" iti Vāmanīyāḥ. tadāhuḥ, yatpadāni tyajanty eva parivṛttisahiṣṇutām, tam sabdanyāyaniṣṇātāḥ sabdapākam pracakṣate.

The first part of this passage appears not to be a verbal quotation from Vāmana's work (where it is not to be found), but a mere rendering of the meaning of the quoted stanza.

⁵⁵ Yad ekasmin vastuni mahākavīnām aneko' pi pāţhalı paripākavān bhavati tasmād rasocitasabdārthasūktinibandha naḥ pākaḥ.

style, the diction, word, and sense together become tasteful to the learned ones."

The author also quotes a stanza from Vāmana's work, which here, however, is presented in another context, viz. the Vaidarbha rīti (to I, 2, 11):

"There may be a speaker, there may be (good) sense, there may be (a usage of words which is correct according to) grammar, without this ($p\bar{a}ka$, as Rājaśekhara means)⁵⁶ the honey of speech will not flow."

According to the view of Rājašekhara himself pāka is primarily conveyed by words, and hence taken as śabdavyutpatti or sauśabdya; is chiefly the province of abhidhā; yet it finds its scope only in artha or the idea, which is established by the appreciation of the men of taste⁵.

After that there follows an enumeration of nine defferent kinds of $p\bar{a}ka$, which we will not describe.

As regards the poet there are also many other theories mentioned and founded by Rājaśekhara. It is, however, not possible to describe all these things here; only a few of them I may be allowed to refer to. They are given in the tenth adhyāya, the name of which is kavicaryā rājacaryā ca.

After having carefully studied the sciences ($vidy\bar{a}$, viz. nouns and verbs, lexicography, prosody, and the doctrine of the $alamk\bar{a}ras$) and their accessories ($upavidy\bar{a}$, viz. the sixty-four arts), one should en-⁵⁶ In the context of the verse in Vāmana's book we must understand "without the Vaidarbhī rīti." See p. 135.

^{57 &}quot;Kāryānumeyatā yat tac chabdanivedyah param pāko 'bhidhāvişayas tat sahrdayaprasiddhisiddha eva vayavahārān-gam asau" iti Yāyāvarīyah.

desvour to compose a kāvya. Some other things are designated the mothers of the kāvya (kāvya-mātarah), which are the presence of a good poet, news from (or about) the country (deśavārtā), the speeches of the learned ones, the course of worldly life, the meetings of the wise ones, and the compositions of the old poets. The author quotes a stanza, according to which eight things are considered as the mothers of kavi-ship: Well-being (svāsthya), fancy (pratibhā), practice (abhyāsa), devotion to the gurus (bhakti), the tales of the wise ones (vidvatkathā), wide scholarship (bahušrutatā), good memory (smrtidārdhya), and self-reliance (anirveda⁵⁸).

Further, the poet should be pure. There are three kinds of purity: of the speech, (vākšauca), of the mind (manaḥšauca), and of the body (kāyašauca). The first two have their origin in the śāstras. Regarding the purity of the body the author presents the following particulars: the poet should pare the nails of his feet; he should chew tāmbūla (a leaf of piperbetel) after meals⁵⁹; he should anoint the body; his garment should be splendid though not excessively so; in his hair there should be flowers; in other words, he should be a perfect gentleman.

⁵⁸ Some of these things are dealt with by the author on another occasion being considered there from a different point of view.

⁵⁹ Rājaśekhara says only satāmbūlam mukham, but the meaning is apparently as rendered above. Compare a stanza in the 7th ullāsa of the Kāvyapsakāša (verse 180):

tāmbūlabhṛtagallo' yam bhallam jalpati mānuşah, karoti khādanam pānam sadaiva tu yathā tathā.

As to his abode Rājasekhara gives a full description as it should be: it is well cleansed; has rooms fit for every one of the six seasons; its garden preserved by the trees from heat, has a little pleasure-hill, lakes, and ponds, hamsas, cakoras, a bath-room, a pavilion, a palanquin, etc. etc.

The persons who are in this ideal dwelling place must, of course, be endowed with certain qualities in order to support the working poet: there should be a solitary place, where the poet can stay quite alone and undisturbed by anybody's presence. His attendants are skilled in Apabhramśa, his female servants speak a dialect mixed with Māghadhī, the ladies of his harem speak Sanskrit and Prakrit, and his friends all languages. His writer is skilled in all languages, too, and has some other excellent qualities, he should be himself a poet. The master of the house is, of course, setting the fashion also with regard to particulars concerning pronunciation and the like⁶⁰.

Writing material must be close at the poet's hand. According to the masters there are the "retinue" of the science of $k\bar{a}vya$. No, retorts Rāja-sekhara, $pratibh\bar{a}$ is the "retinue."

of the magadhas, had prohibited the use of cerebrals with the exception of p, and of s, s, s and of k. King Kuvinda of the Sūrasenas did the same with respect to harsh groups of consonants. King Sātavāhana of the Kuntalas and King Sāhasānka in Uijayinī gave order to speak only Prakrit or Sanskrit respectively. Regarding Sātavāhana and Sāhasānka compare Kāmasūtra II, 7, 28 and Sarasvatīkanthābharana II, 15.

After some other remarks, which will be touched on elsewhere, the author speaks of the division of time. As we have seen. Vāmana has also dealt with this question, but Rajasekhara goes much more into detail. The poet should rise early in the morning and, after having performed Sandhyā, he should read the Sarasvatasūkta. Then he may, if he likes, stay in the academy (vidyāvasatha) and study the sciences and their accesories some three hours or so (ā praharāt). The second āyāma should be devoted to the composition of the kāvya. About noon he should bathe and eat what is not forbidden. After dinner he may hold a meeting where questions concerning the kāvya are discussed (kāvyagoṣṭhī). The occupation in the third ayama are of various kinds. In the fourth ayama the poet should hold an examination of that part of the kāvya he has written before moon, in the presence of some learned persons, and correct and amend what is considered as being less good. In the evening he may again worship Sandhyā and Sarasvatī. By the beginning of the night (ā pradosāt) he should write down the corrected kāvya. After having slept well in the first and second part of the night he should rise very early. i. e. during the fourth part on the night, for early in the morning the mind sees things very clearly. This subject is treated a good deal longer still by Rajasekhara, but we shall not pursue it further here.

Not only the men but also the women should endeavour to compose kāvya, because the saṃsāra, which is the working cause, is based not on the sexual difference but rather on the ātman, or the soul, if we are allowed to render the word in this way. There have been daughters of kings and ministers, courtezans, etc. who have understood the sāstra and have become poetesses.

Omitting some other remarks, which are more amusing than important, we shall deal with a more interesting subject not mentioned by any of the former representatives of the alamkāraśastra in a few words: the examination of the kavi. The kingpoet (rājakavih) should arrange a kavi-meeting. In order to examine a kāvya or a śāstra he must have a hall built, with sixteen pillars, four doors, and eight turrets, and a pleasure house (keligrha). which should be attached to the hall. In the middle of the hall there should be a vedikā one hasta high and the floor should be adorned with jewels. During the examination the king sits on this throne. To the north of him the Sanskrit poets take their seats. behind them are the Veda-learned (vedaviduāvid). the logicians (prāmānika), the Purāna-scholars (paurānika). the scholars in the domain of smrti (smārta), the physicians (bhişaj), the astrologers (mauhūrtika). and the like. To the north of him there sit the Prakrit poets, and behind them the dancers (nartaka). actors (nața), singers (gāyana), musicians (vādaka), vāgitvanas, kušīlavas, tālāvacaras, who appear to have been certain groups of bards. To the west of him there come the Apabhramsa poets; behind them the painters (citralekhakrt), jewel-setters and similar classes (māṇikyabandhaka, vaikaṭika, svarṇakāravar-dhakilohakāra); and to the south of him the Bhūta-bhāṣa poets, behind them paramours, (bhujaṇga), courtezans (gaṇikā), rope-dancers (plavaka), śaubhi-kas⁶², wrestlers (malla), and soldiers (śastropajivin).

⁶¹ Compare Kāmasūtra I, 3, 12: Santy api Khalu šāstraprahatabuddhayo gaņikā rājaputryo mahāmātraduhitaras ca.

Then the king opens the discussion and examines the kāvya. In doing so he should emulate the famous "presidents" of older times, as Vāsudeva, Sātavāhana, Sūdraka, Sāhasānka. He should honour the poets according to their merits. In the great cities the king should establish similar committees (brahmasabhā) in order to have kāvyas and šāstras examined. Whosoever has undergone this parīksā should be driven in a particular carriage (brahmaratha) and crowned with a diadem. Rājasekhara closes this unique chapter with the following verses, speaking of kāvya-examinations in Ujjayinī and šāstra-examinations in Pāṭaliputra.

Śrūyate cojjayinyam kāvyakāraparīkṣā—
iha Kālidāsa-Menṭhāv atr-Āmara-Rūpa-Sūra-Bhāravayaḥ, Haricandra-Candraguptau parīkṣitāv iha višālāyām.
Śrūyate ca Paṭaliputre śāstrakāraparīkṣā—atr-Opavarsa-Varsāv iha Paṇini-Piṅgalāv iha Vyāḍiḥ, Vararuci-Patañjalī iha parīkṣitāḥ khyātim upajagmuḥ.
ittham sabhāpatir bhutvā yaḥ kāvyāni parīkṣate, yašas tasya jagadvyāpi sa sukhī tatra tatra ca⁶⁷.
This is, however, only a pretty story, not fact.

62 Concerning the saubhikas see Prof. H. Lueders' very interesting paper in Sitzungsber. d. Kgl. Preuss. Ak. d. Wiss., philos.-hist. Kl., 1916, pp. 698ff. The passage is borrowed to a great extent from the Arthasūstra, where we read (p. 125): natanartakavāgjīvanakušīlavaplavakasaubhikacāranānām.....sarvatālāvacārānām ca.

⁶³ With respect to these poets, see the remarks of the editors of the Kāvyamīmāṇsā on p. 10, 11 (Notes).

THE DEFINITION OF KAVYA

No exact definition of $k\bar{a}vya$ has been found by the older Indian writers on poetics. Only in more recent times scholars have shown that what is said by the older writers cannot be considered as the essential matter of poetry.

Bhāmaha defines I, 16: sabdārthau sahitau kāvyam.

Word and sense combined (is) the $k\bar{a}vya$ ".

Daņ din says a little more (Kāvyādarśa I, 10): taiḥ śarīram ca kāvyānām alamkārās ca darsitāḥ, śarīram tāvad iṣṭārthavyavacchinnā padāvalī.

"By these (the older scholars) the body and the ornaments of the kāvyas have been pointed out. With respect to the body it consists of a series of words, qualified by the sense which (the poet) wishes to express".

I It has already been mentioned before that Kālidāsa in Raghuvaṃśa I, I appears to refer to such a definition of the kāvya. Nothing, however, can be gathered from this fact, because that or a similar definition was common for a very long time. We get no correct idea of Bhāmaha's opinion on the kāvya, if by the unjustified combination of Bhāmaha I, 16 with I, 30 we construct the following definition sabdārthau sahitau kāvyaṃ yuktam vakrasvabhāvoktyā. This is done by S o v a n i in a paper on pre-dhvani schools of Alaṃkāra (Bhandarkar Commemoration Volume, p. 395). Prof. J a c o b i (Sitzungsber. d. preuss. Ak. d. Wiss., 1922, p. 224) thinks that the term Sāhitya ('poetry') is to be derived from that definition of kāvya.

This definition shows some progress when compared with the simple statement of Bhamaha that the kāvya is word and sense together, without any further explanation concerning the qualification of both sabda and artha. Dandin distinguishes at first between two things which are quite different from each other, and one of which is the body (sarīra). Then there is given a definition of the so-called kāvyaśarīra, which differs from Bhāmaha only in so far that the sense (artha) gets the attribute ista. The second element of the kāvya consists of the alamkāras, with which we will deal later on. In this context the word alamkāra has not the signification of what we call figure of speech, but means the ernament of the kāvya in general. The gunas also are thus to be understood under the name alamkāra. The entire first book of the Kāvuādarśa deals with the body of the kāvya: the dosas, the gunas, and the rītis are all parts of it.

Vāmana, speaking of the kāvya in the first sūtra of this work, gives no definition. He says kāvyam grāhyam alamkārāt.

"The kāvya is to be seized on bount of the ornament".

In the vetti, however, the definition of Bhāmaha is clearly alluded to:

kāvyam khalu grāhyam upādeyam bhavati, alamkārāt; kāvyasabpo'yam gumālamkārasamskrtayom sabdārthayor vartate; bhaktyā tu sabdārthamātravacano'tra grhyate.

"The word kāvya has the signification of word and sense, which are endowed with gunas and alamkāras; but from reverence (to the older authorities) it is employed as expressing only word and sense".

The word alamkāra is used by Vāmana, as in the Kāvyādarśa in the sense of ornament in general and of the so-called figures of speech. In the sūtra the word has the former signification; for it is said in I, 1, 2: saundaryam alamkārah. "Alamkāra (is) beauty".

The following sūtra shows in which way this alamkāra is to be made: sa doṣaguṇālaṃkārahānā-dānābhyām". This (ornament is to be produced) by avoiding the doṣas and employing the guṇas and alaṃkāras². Thus the word alaṃkāra is used in the double sense.

There is little doubt that Vāmana had the definition of kāvya as given by Bhāmaha in view, and the treatment of the matter shows further what great strength was attributed to the pramāna or authority. For, though Vāmana thinks that the expression sabdārthau is not sufficient to define poetry as it does not show clearly enough, what the characteristic feature of kāvya is, he does not endeavour to present a new definition, which would have contrasted with the hallowed view of the old master in poetics. In the opinion of Vāmana every necessary explication is contained in the old definition.

² The vitti runs: sa khalu alamkāro doņa hīnāt guņālamkārādānāt ca sampādyah kaveh. The next sūtra says where the poet should be instructed regarding doņas, guņas, and alamkāras: "śāstratas tu", and the vitti: te doņaguņālamhārahānādāne śāstrād asmāt.

³ There are many cases in the Kāvyālamkāra-sūtravṛtti

The term $k\bar{a}vya\hat{s}ar\bar{\imath}ra$, which we met in the $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}dar\hat{s}a$, is found also in the $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}lamk\bar{a}ras\bar{\imath}travtti$, but not in agreement with the view of Dandin, in the vrtti to 1, 3, 10: the plot of the $k\bar{a}vya$ is designated by the word $k\bar{a}vya\hat{s}ar\bar{\imath}ra^4$.

Dhvanikāra gives a more accurate qualification of the śabdārtha in the Dhvanyāloka (p. 7), saying śahrdayahrdayāhlādišabdārthamayatvam eva kāvyalakṣanam. "What consists of word and sense in such a manner that it pleases the mind of the learned is called kāvya".

The old definition of $k\bar{a}vya$ we find again in the $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}lank\bar{a}ra$ of R u d r a t a, 1, 2:

nanu šabdārthau kāvyam. "Word and sense (combined is) kāvya".

Mammata is a little more explicit in the Kāvyaprakāśa 1, 4:

tad adosau śabdarthau saguņāv analaņkrtī punah kvacit.

"The (kāvya is) word and sense (combined), and sometimes without alamkāras".

It appears that this definition is a combination of the term of Bhāmaha and the explanation of Vāmana. It is remarkable that Mammata says analamkrtī punah kvacit. The vrtti points out that this is said to prevent the false view that when where the author respects the opinions of Bhāmaha. Sometimes he is quoted verbatim. We must therefore assume that Bhāmaha was a great authority for Vāmana though the latter is a good deal younger than Bhāmaha. Daṇḍin presents quite a different standpoint.

⁴ See note above.

there is no alamkāra as occurs at times, the poem ceases to be a $k\bar{a}vya^5$.

A little more is said by Vāgbhaţa, though the old definition of Bhāmaha is easily discernible.

Vāgbhatālamkāra 1, 2:

sādhusabdārthasandarbham gunālamkārabhūşitam, sphuţarītirasopetam kāvyam kurvīta kīrtaye.

"A kāvya which consists of pleasing word and sense, which is adroned with gunas and alankāras, and which is endowed with distinct rītis and rasas, the poet should compose for fame".

Vagbhata, however, gives no real definition here like his predecessors, but by beginning his book thus, the verse becomes a sort of explanation of what in his opinion the essence of kāvya is. For him as well as for the scholars before him the chief element of poetry was śabdārthau, word and sense combined; it is, also, no new idea that sabdartha is qualified by sādhu and qunālamkārabhūṣita. Considering finally that the differences of style (rīti) according to Dandin, Vamana, and others are based on the differences of the gunas we cannot find anything new in the term riti-upeta. There remains the introduction of the rasa in the definition. This had not been done by any of the older ālamkārikas, though, as a matter of course, they must have considered the development of poetic 'sentiment' as an important feature of poetry, but their definitions do not mention it. The doctrine of the rasa had its place primarily in the drama. Hence it came into the kāvya, and was dealt with in detail by the younger representatives of poetics. This theme, however, requires separate treatment by itself, which is impossible here. This opinion of Vāgbhata has obviously influenced V i s v a n ā t h a, who defines in the Sāhityadarpana 1. 3 the kāvya as follows:

⁵ Vrtti: kvāpīty anenaitad āha yat sarvatra sālamkārau kvacīt tu sphuţālamkāravirahe'pi na kāvyatvahānih.

vākyam rasātmakam kāvyam dosas tasyāpakarskah, utkarsahetavah proktā guņālamkārarītayah.

"A literary composition, the nature of which consists of rasa, is called kāvya. The dosas (faults) impair (its beauty), the gunas (qualities), alamkāras (figures of speech), and rītis (diction) are the causes of its excellence".

The term vākya is nothing else than the wellknown śabdārtha of the older ālamkārikas. Before giving the definition Visvanatha criticizes the opinion of Maminata concerning the same matter sharply, and points out that the definition as given in the Kāvyanrakāśa is false. He declares that in the best kāvyas there can also be found plenty of dosas, though nobody would think that they were losing their kāvya-character thereby. It is true that the scholars have found many 'faults' in the poems of even Kālidāsa. With respect to the term saguna, too, the Kāvyaprakāśa is wrong in the opinion of Visvanātha, because the so-called quaas qualities not of the word, as Mammata opines, but of the rasa. The doctrines of the gunas had assumed another form in the course of time, which did not correspond with that of the scholars of the older period.

We close this chapter by presenting the definition of a more modern writer on poetics, J a g a n n ā t h a, who regards the matter from a more correct point of view. He begins his big work, the Rasagangā-dhara, by a discussion of the question of kāvya and states:

ramanīyārthapratipādakah sabdah kāvyam.

"A composition which produces a pleasing sense is called kāvya".

It must be confessed, however, that this is not an absolutely new definition, for in the Dhvanyāloka we read:

sahrdayahrdayāhlādiśabdārthamayatvam eva kavyalaksanam.

It is remarkable that Jagannātha, in the exhaustive commentary which follows the definition, does not mention these words, whilst he criticizes the definitions of other authorities.

The main point in the definition is ramanīya. In commenting it Jagannātha says: ramanīyatā ca lokottarāhlādajanakajñānagocaratā. "If knowledge brings forth pleasure that goes beyond the common limits, it is ramanīya". In other words, if a literary composition produces a pleasing surprise, a camatkāra, as it is called in the śāstra, we have to do with a kāvya. In the commentary the author deals fully with that camatkāra, which is indeed a characteristic quality of poetry. The following sūtras contain some more details as to the real nature of poetry, pointing out the relation between what is said by words and what remains unspoken; The quality of a kāvva is determinated by this relation.

⁶ See above p. 81.

THE NATURE OF THE ALAMKĀRA

Bhāmaha, after having spoken of the qualities of the good poet, does not yet go on to give the definition of $k\bar{a}vya$. He discusses an interesting question, which is of great importance for the understanding of poetry and which appears to have been the subject of controversy: In which relation do the so-called $alamk\bar{a}ras$ stand to the $k\bar{a}vya^1$. The author says I, 13-15:

rūpakādir alamkāras tasyānyair bahudhoditah, na kāntam api nirbhūṣam vibhāti vanitāmukham.
rūpakādim alamkāram bāhyam ācakṣate pare, supām tinām ca vyutpattim vācām vānchanty alamkṛtim.
tad etad āhuh sausabdyam nārthavyutpattir Idṛśi, sabdābhidheyālamkārabhedād iṣṭam dvayam tu nah.

" $R\bar{u}paka$, etc. are called by other (scholars) the alamkāra (ornament) of the $(k\bar{u}vya)$. The face of a girl, though she may be handsome by nature, does not shine without ornament².

- I 14b and 15a are quoted by Premacandra in his commentary to Dandin's Kāvyādarša I, 10.
- 2 With this stanza III, 57 (at the end of the definitions of the alamkūras) must also be compared:

girām alamkāravidhih savistarah svayam vinišcitya dhiyā mayoditah, anena vāgarthavidām alamkrtā vibhāti nārīva vidagdhamaņḍalā.

"After having settled the matter myself, I have, to the best of my knowledge, exhaustively described the alamkāras of speech. The speech of the sense-knowing (poets) Other (scholars, however,) designate $r\bar{u}paka$, etc. as (mere) exterior ornament (being not closely connected with the essential nature of poetry): They would have the correct formation of nouns and verbs as ornament of sentences (the $k\bar{a}vya$).

This is called sauśabdya by them, and the formation of sense (the so-called arthālaṃkāras) is not of this kind. But in our opinion there are two kinds (of alaṃkāras): alaṃkāras of the words and alaṃkāras of the sense."

These statements show clearly that already in the time of Bhāmaha there were very different views regarding poetry, and that poetics in that period was by no means a recent science. Up to this day, however, nothing is known of the pre-Bhāmaha masters; certainly there were two opinions: According to the first, rūpaka, etc., were called alamkāras; but according to the other, these figures of speech are of an exterior kind, the real alamkāra lying according to them only in the vyutpatti (=alamkāra) of the word (noun and verb, not of the sense). This ornament is designated as saušabdya. The above mentioned stanzas of Bhāmaha are quoted in the being ornamented with these (alamkāras) shines like a girl with lovely ornaments.

One is reminded by this verse of Bhāmaha's reading of the following stanza of Vāgbhaṭā (Vāgbhaṭālaṃkāra IV,1): doṣair muktaṃ guṇair yuktaṃ api yenojjhitaṃ vacaḥ.
strīrūpam iva no bhāti taṃ bruve'laṃkriyoccayam.

"Alamkrivā (alamkāra) is that, without which, a speech does not shine though free from does and endowed with gunas, as the form of a woman does not shine of itself without ornaments".

sixth ullāsa of Mammata's Kāvyaprakāśa and explained exhaustively by the modern commentator Jhalakikara, who has used an older gloss³. The school according to which rūpaka, etc. are excluded as alamkāras and only the so-called śabdālamkāras acknowledged, argues that nothing but the word is able to produce the camatkara: the separate words are combined with each other in a way that an anuprāsa is produced or another of the sabdālamkāras, or that the gunas (mādhurya etc.) come into existence. It is only the word on which all depends. For it is said: "A kāvya is recited, is heard, is sung". Thus, nothing else but the word can be the thing in question. The so-called arthalamkaras, on the other hand, do not possess this particularity, because they are founded on the sense. So these may be considered as something exterior (bāhya), and the term alamkāra can be ascribed to them only in a metaphorical sense⁴. The relation between the gunas (as far as it is possible to speak of gunas in connexion with Bhāmaha) and the alamkāras is according to Bhāmaha not the same as in the opinion of the later writers. Mādhurya, prasāda and ojas, which the author defines without using, however, the designation of guna, are not sharply separated from the alamkāras; in one passage the word guna is even evidently used in the sense of alamkāra⁵.

³ Reference may be made to the explanation given by Jhalakikara in his ed. of the Kāvyaprakāsa, 2nd Ed., Bombay, 1901, pp. 313f: tasya kāvyasya rūpakūdiķ......guņa evēti bhāvaķ. Then the author gives a quotation from the sārabodkinī of the same tenor.

The commentary of Māṇikyacandra, published in the Ānandāśrama Sanskrit Series, No. 89, p. 120, remarks: Gaudamatam etat. Tad etad iti. Suptinātmakam saušabdyam šabdavaicitryam. Šabdūlamkūrasūdhikā nedršī. Na suptinātmikety arthali. Athavūrthavyutpattir arthūlamkūrarūpā. Rūpakūdyalamkrtir īdršy antarangā na. Kim tarhi gauņā. Ity api vyūkhyā. Athavūrtha vyutpattir api kūvyaprayojyatvena matety āha: dvayam tu na iti. Bhāmahali šabdasyārthasya cālamkārān iṣṭavān param guņaprādhānyena.

Bhāmaha is not of the opinion of these scholars (evidently the gaudas)⁶, but holds, without giving further arguments against the other view, that there are two sorts of homogeneous alamkāras: śabda and arthālamkāras. And this opinion became predominant: the same division is found again in almost all books on alamkāra. Even Dandin agrees with Bhāmaha on this point, though elsewhere he is always inclined to be at variance with his predecessor. As Dandin belongs to the Vaidarbha school as well as Bhāmaha, this agreement of the two ālamkārikas is nothing to be astonished at.

Bhāmaha did not present a definition of alamkāra. That is done for the first time by Dandin, (Kāvyādarša II, 1).

kāvyasobhākarān dharmān alamkārān ācakṣate.

"Qualities which produce the beauty of the kāvya" are called alamkāras".

⁴ Compare the corresponding text of the last note.

⁵ See below.

⁶ See also the first words of the commentary of Māṇikya-candra referred to in note 3.

⁷ That the word alamkara does not mean "ornament"

This definition is not quite correct, for not only the alamkāras are the causes of the kāvya. There are some other things which have the same effect. The most important among these are the gunas. Though the gunas will be treated exhaustively in another place, it is necessary to deal here, at least, with their general definition, as, reckoning from the time of Vāmana, the doctrine of the gunas is closely connected with that of the alamkāras. It is worth noting that a definition of the gunas is not to be found in the works of Bhāmaha and Dandin, though they in a part of them are referred to by these scholars.

Vā mana appears to have been well aware that Dandin's definition of the alamkāra is not satisfactory. Using the same words as the author of the Kāvyādarśa he explains it in the Kāvyādamkārasūtravrtti, III, 1, 1-2:

Kāvyasobhāyāḥ kartāro dharmā guṇāh, tadatisayahetavas tvalamkārāḥ.

'Qualities which produce the beauty of the kāvya (are called) gunas. The causes of a very high degree (of the beauty of the kāvya are called) alankāras'.

In the vrtti it is especially mentioned that the guṇas must be considered as the elements which produce the kāvya's beauty if there were only alam-kāras, the kāvya would be far from being beautiful^s.

in general here, but "figure of speech" especially appears from the enumeration of the alamkāras in II, 2 ff.

8 ye khalu sabdārthayor dharmāḥ kāvyasobhāṃ kurvanti, te caujaḥprasādādayaḥ na yamakopamādayaḥ, kaivalye teṣām akāvyasobhākaratvāt, ojaḥprasādādīnāṃ tu kevalānām asti

Thus Vāmana has transformed Dandin's definition of alamkāra into a definition of auna, and has from this derived one of alamkāra. The idea, however, apparently was not quite new. Even in the time of Bhamaha the gunas were, though not the same as, but homogeneous to the alamkāras: these may, so to speak, be considered as a sort of continuation of the quass. That at least we can gather from the way the gunas and alamkāras are treated by Bhāmaha. Later on, we shall deal more closely with the matter. Vāmana is, as far as we know, the first who precisely formulated the question regarding the relation between quing and alamkāra. The close connection which Vamana assumes between both is corroborated by him, when he goes on to illustrate the separate gunas: they are divided as well as the alamkāras into bandha-(= sabda) and arthagunas.

Vāmana's treatment of the matter in question was, however, not acknowledged by M a m m a t a. He concedes indeed that the gunas are in some way or another connected with the alamkāras, for he presents the definition of the alamkāra after that of the guna, because the second follows from the first, but the definition itself rests on quite a different point of view (VIII, 66):

ye rasasyāngino dharmā sauryādaya ivātmanah, utkarshetavas te syur acalasthitayo gunāh.

"Those qualities which belong to the rasa like heroism, etc. to the soul and which are the causes kāvyašobhākaratvam. And vitti to III, 1, 2: tasyāḥ kāvyašobhāyā atišayaḥ tadatišayaḥ, tasya hetavaḥ, tuśabdo vyatireke; alamkārās ca yamakopamādayaḥ.

of (the rasas') excellence and have a permanent existence, are called quas".

In the vrtti the author explains that the guṇas are by no means qualities of the sound [which is the opinion of Vāmana, who distinguishes between bandha-(=$abda) and arthaguṇas] but rather qualities of the rasa, the poetical sentiment, as heroism is a quality not of the body but of the soul.

The term acalasthitayah is not new. Even Vāmana said already (I, 3, 3): pūrve nitye "the first (viz. the guṇas) are permanent", and that Mammata's utkarṣahetavah has its parallel in Vāmana's atišayahetavah need not be mentioned. The quintessence, however, is that Mammata considers the theory of guṇa and alaṃkāra from a different standpoint, the rasa. This fact touches the question of the soul of poetry, which will be dealt with in another chapter.

After having explained the character of guna Mammata goes on to define alamkāra (67):

upakurvnati tam santam ye'ngadvāreņa jātucit, hārādivad alamkārās te'nuprāsopamādayaḥ.

"Qualities, which sometimes help an extisting (rasa) by means of a link (viz. word or sense), as necklaces, etc. (which are put round the neck of a person and thus adorn him) are the alamkāras, anuprāsa, upamā, etc".

While the gunas are integral parts of the rasa, the alamkāras have rather an accidental or unessential character, as they aid or adorn the rasa which, without them, is already complete in itself. This ornament can be referred to the sense or to the word which expresses the sense, and thus we get two sorts of alamkāras: śabda and artha. commentary says somewhat more than the suiras. It happens, says the vrtti, that in certain cases there is no rasa; then the alamkāras are used only with the aim of making the verbal turn of expression (uktivaicitrua) interesting. Besides this a third case is possible, when, though there are rasas, the employed alamkāras do not help these rasas, but have nothing to do with them really. The author illustrates the mentioned possibilities by some examples. After having done so he goes on to criticise Vāmana's opinion of the gunas and alamkāras which he calls For, if we assume that Vāmana is right, then the following question arises: Is poetry constituted by the co-existence of all gunas or only by a part of them? If the first is the case the Gaudi and Pāncālī must cease to be poetry, as in the opinion of Vāmana these dictions have only a part of the This is absurd. In the second case ten rasas. such sentences which contain a few gunas, but contain nothing which can be called a poetic idea in their structure, would be poetry notwithstanding. In the following example:

adrāv atra prajvalaty agnir uccaih, prājyah prodyann ullasaty eşa dhūmah.

"On this mountain there shines a fire; thence rises great smoke" the guna ojas is contained, but nobody would be inclined to see any poetic idea in the two lines.

⁹ I shall not consider the question here whether we must conclude from the divergence of the commentary and the sutras that the author of the text is not the same as that of the vrtii. cf. V. Sukthankar, ZDMG. 66, 477 ff., 533 ff.

Not less wrong, continues the Kāvyaprakāśa, is Vāmana's definition of alamkāra. For according to the author an alamkāra can occur only where a guna already exists. He presents the following instance:

svargprāptir anenaiva dehena varavarņinī, asyā radacchadaraso nyakkarotitarām sudhām.

"This beautiful woman embodies the acquisition of heaven on account of this (beautiful) body; the sweetness of her lips despises nectar."

This contains in spite of the absence of any guna the two arthalamkaras Visesokti and Vyatireka and this is without doubt poetry.

THE SOUL OF POETRY

We shall now touch on another interesting subiect and consider what the older scholars take to be the soul of poetry. A big step forward is to be observed in the Kāvvādarša. In the opinion of Dandinan essential part of poetry is its 'body' (sarīra) and he declares (I. 10) that this body is opposed to a second thing, which is represented by the alamkāras. These alamkāras adorn the kāvya as ornaments adorn the body of a woman, and in the beginning of the second adhyāya, alamkāras are called those qualities which produce the Kāvya's Indeed, the entire arrangement of the poetic matter as treated by Dandin leaves doubt that he considers the alamkāras as the main part of poetry; and so does B h a m a h a too, Thus both Bhamaha and Dandin were still far from looking upon poetry from a higher point of view. In Kāvyādarsa I, 42, however, we are told: iti Vaidarbhamārgasya prānā daša gunāh smrtāh. "These spirits of the Vaidarbha-rīti are called the ten gunas," but this refers only to the Vaidarbha-style, and the author by no means wished to say that the gunas should be considered as the spirit in general. There is no doubt that in the eyes of Bhāmaha and

I H. Jacobi, Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka (ZD MG., vol. 56, p. 393). We find the term kāvyaŝarīra also in Bhāmaha's Kāvyālaṃkāra I, 23, but Bhāmaha means thereby the kāvya as a whole. One might be inclined to consider bhāvikatva (III, 52, 53) as the soul of poetry accord-

Dandin the essential part of poetry is formed by the alamkāras, though they do not speak positively of the "soul".

Vā manahas followed Dandin in so far as the sentence (vākya) is called by him the body of the kāvya. He says in vrtti to 1, 26: rītir nāmeyam ātmā kāvyasya, śarīrasya veti vākyaśeṣaḥ, but pursuing this idea he goes much farther than Dandin, so that in his view poetry assumes quite a new aspect. He is the first scholar that speaks of the soul (ātman) of poetry. And what is the soul of poetry? Sūtra 1, 2-6 answers: rītir ātma kāvyasya "the style is the soul of poetry".

It is true that the Kāvyādarśa also contains the doctrine of style and of the guṇas, which are closely connected with it; but rīti is nothing independent here, being, on the contrary, a part of the doctrine of Kāvyaśarīa. According to Vāmana, both rīti (and guṇas) have nothing to do with the body of poetry: rīti is the soul of poetry.

This idea of Vāmana's was progressive but it was a matter of little satisfaction that the style should be the essential and life-giving part of poetry. As the rīti regards only the expression of ideas and not the idea itself, it regards merely the outside, so to say, and Dandin was right to consider it as a part of the body.

ing to Bhāmaha. This figure of speech does not refer to a single stanza, as alamkāras generally do, but to the whole composition (prabandhaviṣayam guṇam). Bhāvikatva, on the other hand, is regarded by Bhāmaha as alamkāra or, what in this case seems to be the same, as guṇa.

U d b h a t a, who appears to have lived at the same time as Vāmana but exercised a greater influence, has a more correct opinion regarding the "soul of poetry" designating by this term the rasa. After having defined the alamkāras, bhāvika, and kāvyalinga Udbhata says (VI, 17):

rasādyadhisthitam kāvyam jīvyam jīvadrūpatayā yatah, kathyate tad rasādīnām kāvyātmatvam vyavasthitam.

"As a $k\bar{a}vya$, which is endowed with rasa and so on, is taken to be a living form, the rasa is called the soul of the $k\bar{a}vya$ ".

And with respect to the alamkāra bhāvika the author remarks (VI, 14)

rasollāsī kaver ātmā svacche sabdārthadarpaņe, mādhuryaujoguņapraudhe pratibimbya prakāsate,,²

"The rasa-bright soul of the kavi shines reflected in the pure mirror of word and sense, endowed with the gunas mādhurya and ojas".

Though this opinion of Udbhata's certainly shows progress, a quite clear idea of the quintessence of poetry was not yet found, even by Udbhata, as we may conclude from the word ādi in VI, 17. This is not surprising, if we consider that in that period the doctrine of rasa was still in its development. The doctrine of rasa, taken apparently from the dramatic poetry, was taught by the older ālamkārikas only in connection with a few figures of speech, the tenor of which indicates a certain state of mind. Not long, however, after the time of Udbhata (perhaps still under his influence) there arose a new system of poetical aesthetics. This is the doctrine of dhvani (the doctrine of the unexpressed), which was given in detail in the Dhvanyāloka. According to it the dhvani was the soul of poetry. What he teaches is shortly the following: The soul of poetry is the tenor (artha), and this tenor is twofold: it can be expressed by words (vācya) and can be suggested (pratīyamāna). Only the latter kind is of value for poetry, and thus nothing else than the unexpressed and merely suggested sense can be called the soul of poetry.

² Jacob (JRAS. 1897, p. 846) has the variants rāsollāsī, mādhuryaujoyutapraudhė, and prativindya.

3 Compare also Jacobi's introductory pages to the translation of the Dhvanyāloka (ZDMG., vol. 56 and pp. 9-16 of the same author's introduction to Ruyyaka's Alamkārasarvasva. Another work on the same subject is the Vakroktijīvita. As H. Jacobi informs me, this work has been found now and has been edited by Dr. S. K. De in the Calcutta Oriental Series.

THE RITI

The doctrine of riti takes up a great deal of space in the older books on alamkāra. The word riti, the main designation of which is 'manner or method', designates in poetry a certain method of poetical diction, and has no equivalent in other languages. If one renders it by 'style or diction', one must remember that nothing is explained thereby regarding the essential nature of riti.

That the doctrine of riti is very old may be gathered from the manner of its treatment in Bhāmaha's $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}lamk\bar{a}ra$. Though we do not know in which way older authorities have dealt with the matter in question, it is certain that there were two styles opposed to each other: $Vaidarbh\bar{i}$ and $Gaud\bar{i}y\bar{a}$, and that the $Vaidarbh\bar{i}$ was regarded as the better one, of course only by the poets in $Vaidarbh\bar{i}$ riti. As a matter of fact there was once a period during which $Gaud\bar{i}y\bar{a}$ riti had famous poets and a great influence upon the development of poetry, but in course of time $Vaidarbh\bar{i}$ grew superior and determined the direction poetry was going to take, to the advantage of Indian poetic literature, as we may add.

Before the time of Bhāmaha there was lively discussion about the existence of two different styles: Vaidarbhī and Gaudīyā. Bhāmaha opposes this view saying (1, 31-35):

vaidarbham anyad astīti manyante sudhiyo' pare, tadeva ca kila jyāyaḥ sadartham api nāparam. gaudīyam idam etat tu vaidarbham iti kim pṛthak, gatānugatikanyāyān nānākhyeyam amedhasām. nanu cāsmakavaṃśādi vaidarbham iti kathyate, kāmam tathāstu prāyena samjñecchāto vidhīyate. apuṣṭārtham avakrokti prasannam rju komalam, bhinnam geyam ivedam tu kevalam srutipeśalam. alamkāravad agrāmyam art hyam nyāyyam anākulam, gaudīyam api sādhīyo vaidarbham iti nānyathā.

"Some scholars hold Vaidarbha (riti) as a different (thing). And (they say that) this is the better, (because) it has a good sense, and not the other (Gaudiya). But where is, we reply, the difference between saying this is Guudiya and saying that is Vaidarbha? The very same thing is to be called by different names by the foolish ones according to the method of one who hangs his judgment on the sleeve of another. But (the other answer) is not Cāsmakavamśa³ etc. called a Vaidarbha (composition)? That may be so! Names are usually given capriciously. In the opinion of those scholars, Gaudiya is of a not well developed sense, has no poetical ornaments, straight, and tender; the other (Vaidarbha)

I Or should we translate: "This (Vaidarbhī) is the better, and not the other (Gaudīvā), though this (latter) may be of a good sense"? I preferred the above given translation on account of apuṣṭārtham in stanza 34 and arthyam in stanza 35.

² Gatānugatika was a proverbial saying. Compare Pañcatantra I, 342: gatānugatiko loko na lokah pāramār thikah.

³ Nothing is known as regards this composition.

⁴ Vakrokti, verbatim 'curved manner of speaking' has various meanings in poetics. Here it is apparently the same as alamkāra, as may be gathered from alamkāravad in verse 35.

is, as it were, to be sung; only this is agreeable for hearing, has poetical ornaments, is not vulgar, of a good sense, suitable, and not confused. But (so we reply) also Gaudiya is excellent and does, after all, not differ from Vaidarbha."

A much clearer picture of rītis we gain from Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarsa. As Daṇḍin is an opponent of Bhāmaha we are not surprised that he criticizes Bhāmaha's dealing with rīti severely. The author of the Kāvyādarsa opens (I, 40) with a polemic note:

asty aneko girām mārgah sūksmabhedah parasparam, tatra vaidarbhagaudīyau varņyete prasphuṭāntarau.

"There are many kinds of diction (style), very finely distinguished from each other; but of these (many kinds of style) Vaidarbha and Gaudīya are described, (because) their differences are especially manifest."

This verse can only be fully understood when it is taken to be pointed at Bhāmaha: There are not only two sorts of rītis but many; but only two of them, Vaidarbha and Gaudīya, which in the opinion of Bhāmaha have no distinctive features, are described in detail, because, just on the contrary, their differences are peculiarly clear.

Of what kind are these manifest differences between Vaidarbha and Gaudiya? The author says (I, 41, 42):

"Sleşa, prasāda, samatā, mādhurya, sukumāratā, arthavyakti, udāratva, ojas, kānti, and samādhi: these spirits of the Vaidarbha style are called the ten qunas. Mostly one sees the contrary of them in the Gauda style."

Thus the doctrine of riti is closely connected with that of gunas, and we have therefore to deal with the nature of the above mentioned ten gunas as far as it is necessary for the understanding of $riti^5$.

In the opinion of Dandin the ten guṇas are peculiarities especially of Vaidarbha rīti, while, if we may say so, the guṇas of Gaudīya are opposed to those of Vaidarbhī. Bhāmaha, too, mentions some qualities, wherein Gaudīya and Vaidarbha according to the 'incorrect' opinion of some scholars are said to differ from each other. But they are of another kind. A few of the guṇas enumerated by Dandin we also find in Bhāmaha's work, but not directly connected with rīti. They are not qualities of a certain style (the differences of which are denied by him), but rather of the good kāvya generally. We shall see that matters are considered in a similar way by Vāmana. But let us see, what we are told about guṇas by Bhāmaha.

In the beginning of the second pariccheda the author says:

"The wise (poets), who claim mādhurya and prasāda, do not employ too many compounds.

Some (poets, however), who are willing to express ojas (prefer) long compounds, as mandārakusumareņupinjaritālakāh (whose curls were coloured yellow by the pollen of mandāra flowers)."

Bhāmaha continues (II, 3):

⁵ A fuller description of guna will be given in another place, so as not to disturb the context here. I may, however, mention the fact, that Vāmana's treatment of the gunas is totally different from the one we find in the Kāvyādarša.

śrāvyam nātisamastārtham kāvyam madhuram işyate, āvidvadanganābālapratītārtham prasādavat.

"A kāvya, which is agreeable to hear and expresses the sense by words which are not too much compunded, is considered as madhura (attractive). The sense (of the kāvya), which is to be understood by the wise, by women, and by children has prasāda (clearness)."

With these three verses the whole question is settled for Bhāmaha; verse 4 contains the first group of alamkāras. From the fact that the author has nothing more to say regarding ojas we may gather that according to him ojas is not a good quality of the kāvya. It is most remarkable that Bhāmaha, in dealing with mādhurya, prasāda, and ojas, does not mention the term guna. As a matter of course, the doctrine of guna was fully developed even before his time, because it is mentioned in the Nātyaśāstra⁸.

⁶ Quoted by Mallinātha and Jayamangala in their commentaries to the Bhattikāvya XI, I. Both authors read śrāvya instead of śravya as given by Trivedi. Hemacandra in Kāvyānuśāsanaviveka quotes the first line as follows: tena "śravyam nātisamastārthaśabdam madhuram işyata" iti mādhuryalakṣanatvena śravyatvam yad Bhāmahenoktam tan na yuktam ity arthah. As Trivedi mentions in Bhandarkar Commemoration Volume, p. 410, a definition quite similar to this is ascribed by Pradīpakāra to an ālamkārika Bhāskara by name. Pradīpakāra says: Bhāskaras tu śravyatvam mādhuryaṣya lakṣaṇam āha sma tad ayuktam.

⁷ Or should we rather read avidvad° and take it as an adjective to anganā and bāla? Then the sense would be a little more clear.

⁸ We shall return to this matter on another occasion.

Bhāmaha, therefore, knew the guna theory very well, but he totally rejected it as he rejected the theory of 'different styles'. Treating the rīti (I, 31-35) he mentions some qualities which in the Kāvyādarša are taught as gunas, but these are also of no peculiar value in the eyes of Bhāmaha. Only two qualities mādhurya and prasāda are of importance, but by no means with regard to one certain sort of diction, but to the kāvya in general.

The whole second pariccheda of Bhāmaha's is devoted to the illustration of the alamkāras. Now the first three stanzas contain mādhurua and prasāda. Are we not justified to conclude from this remarkable fact that two qualities (as we may call them) were in some way or another homogeneous to the alamkaras themselves, though they are not alamkāras in the strict sense of the word? And does not Vamana derive the definition of alamkara from that of guna? even in Bhāmaha's work there is a passage, where no great distinction is made between quaa and alamkāra. In III. 1-4 the enumeration of those alamkāras is given, the definition and illustration of which is the subject of the following verses. Stanza 4 closes: bhāvikatvam ca nijagur alamkaram sumed-Dealing with the alamkara bhavika the author remarks: bhavikatvam iti prahuh prabandhavişayam gunam, pratyakşa iva drsyante yatrartha bhūtabhāvinah. "That quality (guna) is called bhāvikatva, the sphere of which is the composition as a whole (and not a single stanza as it is the case regarding the other alamkāras), where past or future things are standing, as it were, before one's eyes. Thus guna is in the opinion of Bhāmaha not essentially different from, though not identical with alamkāra. Udbhata is, as regards bhāvika, of the same opinion as Bhāmaha. He remarks too that bhāvikatva is accompanied by mādhurya and ojas. The term guna is not used in this connection by Udbhata¹⁰.

⁹ See above p. 90.

Let us, however, return to Dandin's treatment of rīti. Bhāmaha had but little to say on this subject, wholly denying the existence of different styles and also the theory of the ten gunas. As Dandin is the opponent of Bhāmaha, he teaches not only the existence of several rītis and of the ten gunas but also goes into the explanation and illustration of the matter at great length. According to his opinion the ten gunas are qualities of the Vaidarbhī rīti, but not qualities of the kāvya in general. With regard to the single gunas Dandin gives the following account:

1 Sleşa.

I, 43: ślistam asprstaśaithilyam alpaprāņāksarottaram, śithilam mālatīmālā lolālikalilā yathā.

"That (is called) ślista which does not possess "looseness." "Loose" is what to the greater part consists of syllables which are pronounced with (only) little breath, as: mālatīmālā lolālikalilā¹¹." Daņḍin explains (I, 44). anuprāsadhiyā gauḍais tad iṣṭaṃ bandhagauravāt, vaidarbhair mālatiīdāma laṅghitaṃ bhramarair iti.

¹⁰ The passage is found in the Kāvyālamkārasamgraha VI, 13-15: The later ālamkārikas appear to be dependent on Bhāmaha; cf. Kāvyaprakāśa X, 28; Alamkārasarvasva p. 183; Jayamangala and Mallinatha, commenting on Bhatti-kāvya XII, I, refer to Bhāmaha.

¹¹ For iti in verse 53 seems to refer to the whole preceding stanza, and not only to the last pāda.

"On account of their being prepossessed in favour of anuprāsa the Gaudas are fond of this. The Vaidarbhas (on the other hand) like on account of the stability of composition the following: mālatīdāma langhitam bhramaraih."

A sentence like mālatīmālā lolālikalilā is notwithstanding its looseness, liked by the western poets, because it contains the śabdālamkāra anuprāsa, which is very highly estimated by them. The Eastern poets, on the other hand, attach more value to the stability of composition, as the instance mālatīdāma langhitam bhramaraih shows.

2 Prasāda.

I, 45: prasādavat prasiddhārtham indor indīvaradyuti, lakṣma lakṣmīm tanotīti pratītisubhagam vacaḥ.

"That is 'clear' the sense of which is well-known, e.g. a sentence like the following: 'the moon's spot shining like a dark lotus beauty' is beautiful on account of its clear perception."

Everybody knows without any further explanation what is meant by poet's indivara, indu, etc. As to the Gaudas the author says I, 46:

vyutpannam iti gaudīyair nātirūdham apīsyate, yathānatyarjunābjanmasadrksāuko balaksaguh.

"If that is based on the words' etymology, the Gaudas also like a mode of expression not altogether clear, e.g.: The white-beamer (i. e. the moon) has a spot which is similar to the unbright (i. e. derk) waterborn ones (i. e. the lotuses)."

Here the poet employs rare words: arjuna, better known as a byname of Kārtavīrya than as 'white'; still stranger is the term an-atyarjuna as meaning

'dark', and in the same way balaksagu and abjanma. After all, the words laksma laksmim tanoti in I, 45 would not be liked by the Gaudas, because the connection given in I, 46 would not be liked by the Vaidarbhas as, besides the bombastic mode of expression, it contains too harsh combinations of consonants.

3 Samatā.

 I, 47: samanı bandheşv avişamanı te mrdusphuţamadhyamāh, bandhā mṛdusphuṭonmiśravarṇavinyāsayonayaḥ.

"Sama (evenness) is the non-unevenness in the composition; the compositions that are founded upon the employment of soft, harsh, or mixed (soft and harsh) sounds are soft, harsh, or medium (respectively)."

He adds further in I, 48-50:

"To me comes the malaya-wind, talkative through the cooing of the kokilas, sprinkled by the drops of the mountain-streams, which are quite clear and the drops of which are going with (the wind). This malaya-wind, the fragrance of which is great on account of its relation to the sandle-wood, rivals the breath from the mouths of beautiful girls, because its steadiness increases.

A Gauda kāvya-style of this kind, which (as verse 49 shows) takes no care of the unevenness and respects only the splendour of sense and alamkāra acquired a wide extension."

The main point of this guna is a certain uniformity in the sequence of the sounds, the combinations of sound being soft, harsh, or medium. The poet, however, should not be heedless and thus cause a pell-mell of sounds, the effect of which becomes disagreeable to the ear. So it is in the opinion of the Vaidarbhas, while the Gaudas, on the contrary, pay no attention to this matter, aiming only at brilliant or rather bombastic expressions. As to the instance given by Dandin, 48° appears to illustrate mrdu, 48° sphuta samatā, and 49 viṣamatā as peculiar to the Gaudīya rīti¹².

4 Mādhurya.

I, 51: madhuram rasavad väci vastuny api rasasthitih, yena mādyante dhīmanto madhuneva madhuvratah.

"Madhura is what contains rasa; (and in this case) rasa lies in both word and sense. By this (rasa) the knowing ones grow intoxicated as bee by honey."

In the treatment of madhura Dandin differs absolutely from Bhāmaha, who as we have seen, spoke of madhura too. According to Bhāmaha mādhurya is in line with prasāda, as in both 'qualities' the length of compounds is the decisive point. Dandin, criticising his rival, states (wholly different as) something the essential matter of mādhurya, which has different interpretation of this stanza: "Slista is what to a large extent consists of syllables which are pronounced with only little breath and what therefore is loose, whereat the looseness, however, is not felt too obviously, e.g. mālatīmālā lolālikalilā (a garland of mālatī-flowers covered with swarming bees)." Prof. Lüders pointed out to me that this cannot be the correct meaning of Dandin's words. Mālatīmālā lolālikalilā is not an example of ślista, but of śithila, which fault the poet should avoid. That this is correct appears from Kāvyādarša I, 69, where the author refers to I, 43 (See below p. 109).

nothing to do with compounds. To illustrate and to defend his diverging opinion against Bhāmaha, the author of the Kāvyādarśa treats the subject more exhaustively than he does that of other gunas.

The second line of I, 51 is, though closing the 'definition', an instance for that kind of madhura where the rasa lies in the repetition of similar sounds. The next stanza explains:

yayā kayācic chrutyā yat samānam anubhūyate, tadrūpā hi padāsattih Sānuprāsā rasāyahā.

"An uninterrupted line of words of such a kind that one hears in one way or another (words of) similar (sounds) embraces rasa, because that (line of words) is endowed with anuprāsa."

Thus, the guna mādhurya has for an inherent factor an anuprāsa, especially the so-called srutyanuprāsa.

Another instance is given in verse I, 53: eşa rājā yadā lakṣmīm prāptavān brāhmaṇapriyaḥ, tataḥ prabhṛti dharmasya loke 'sminn utsavo' bhavat.

"Since that time this king, the friend of the brahmins, had got the royal power, was a feast of dharma in this world."

In this stanza homogeneous sounds sa and ra, ja and ya, da and la, ma and pa, etc. are set close to each other a.

The Gaudas do not like, as is mentioned in I, 54, this kind of anuprāsa, where homogeneous sounds are repeated, being, on the contrary, more fond of the repetition of the very same sounds.

¹³ The commentary says: atra sakārarakārayor ekasmin mūrdhani evam jakārayakārayos tālau, dakāralakāroyos ca dante uccāryamāṇatvāt sāmyam iti śrutyanuprāsaḥ, sa ca dharmavīrapatipuṣṭasya rājaviṣayakaratibhāvasya vyañjaka iti mādhuryarasabhāvaḥ.

In the following verses Dandin goes on to illustrate the second sort of mādhurya, where the rasa lies in the sense. He says (I, 62):

kāmam sarvo 'py alamkāro rasam arthe nisiñcati, tathāpy agrāmyataivaitam bhāram vahati bhūyasā.

"Though every alamkāra pours rasa upon the sense, only a not vulgar mode of expression does above all justice to this (end)."

This is explained by quoting some instances, wherein by the use of vulgar and obscene words the rasa of sense is lost.

After the remark that in the foregoing verses mādhurya is explained in its various forms (vibhaktam iti mādhuryam) Daņdin defines the next guņa.

5. Sukumāratā

I, 69: anişthurākṣaraprāyam sukumāram iheṣyate, bandhaśaithilyadoṣas tu darśitah sarvakomale.

"What consists to a great extent of not rough syllables is called here (in Vidarbha) sukumāra. We have, however, pointed out (in I, 43^b) a fault which consists in the looseness of composition in this case, where there are soft syllables throughout 14."

Example I, 70, 71:

maṇḍalīkṛtya barhāṇi kaṇṭhair madhuragītibhiḥ, kalāpinaḥ pranṛtyanti kāle jīmūtamālini. ity anūrjita evārtho nālaṃkāro' pi tādṛśaḥ, sukmāratayāivaitad ārohati satāṃ manaḥ.

¹⁴ In the verse referred to by the author the fault of looseness is illustrated by "mālatīmālā lolālikalilā" which is liked by the Gaussas, because they are very fond of the authoras; see p. 105.

"Having formed their tail-feathers into a circle, the peacocks dance in autumn, (crying) with throats, the sounds of which are pleasant.

In this stanza the tenor is not very luxurious; only because it contains sukumāratā (the stanza) enters the heart of the wise ones".

Thus sukumārata is a peculiarity of the sound of the words and does not regard the sense. The Vaidarbha style is soft and tender and is in contrast thus to the Gaudīya, which is fond also of words the articulation of which is rather difficult and rough:

dīpatam ity aparair bhūmnā kṛcchrodyam api badhyate. nyakṣeṇa kṣayitaḥ pakṣaḥ kṣatriyāṇāṃ kṣaṇād iti.

"Because they regard it as brilliant, the others (the Gaudas) use also words the pronunciation of which is difficult e.g.: nyakṣeṇa......(By Paraśurāma the party of the kṣatriyas was destroyed in a moment)".

The harshness is caused by the frequency of ks. This, however, is justified by the fact that the verse contains the so-called $v\bar{v}rarasa$. According to the commentary the Vaidarbhas would employ the $guna sukum\bar{a}rat\bar{a}$ also in such a case 15.

6. Arthavyaktı.

I, 73, 74. arthavyaktir aneyatvam arthasya harinoddhṛtā bhūḥ khurakṣuṇṇagāsṛglohitād udadher iti. mahī mahāvarāheṇa lohitād uddhṛtodadheḥ. itīyatvena nirdiṣṭe neyatvam uragāsṛjaḥ.

¹⁵ Gaudā hi yatra vīrarasādirūpam ojasvi vyangyaņ tutra parusavarņais tadvyanjanasyāvasykatayā saukumāryaņ nādriyante, vaidarbhās tu tatrāpi saukumāryaņ pravesayanti.

"There is arthavyakti where the sense is not to be conjectured, as: Hari (Viṣṇu) raised the earth out of the ocean, which was reddened by the blood of the snakes crushed by his claws. If (in this case) nothing would have been said but: The great boar raised the earth out of the reddened ocean, one would have to conjecture 'the blood of the snakes'.

Arthavyakti is not identical with prasāda. As regards the latter, clearness is established in the sense of a word in so far as it is not too unusual, while as to the former a sentence does not contain all that is necessary to understand the connection of ideas wholly. Dandin (I, 75) concedes that the Gaudas also aim at arthavyakti.

7. Udāratna.

I, 76: utkarşavān gunah kaścid yasminn ukte patīyate, tad udārāhvayam tena sanāthā kāvyapaddhatih.

"When in a sentence there is perceived a quality of peculiar excellence, then it is called $ud\bar{a}ra$. The style of the $k\bar{a}vya$ is permeated by this (guna)".

The most important word in this definition is pratiyate. The idea of a special excelling quality is not mentioned directly by words, but is rather suggested by other ideas, which are as such of a more subordinate character. If that is the case, we have the best kind of poetry. In this statement of Dandin's we notice some of the so-called dhvani. Udāratva is illustrated by verse I, 77, 78:

arthinām kṛpaṇā dṛṣṭis tvanmukhe patitā sakṛt, tadavasthā punar deva nānyasya mukham īkṣate. iti tyāgasya vākye'sminn utkarṣaḥ sādhu lakṣyate. anenaiva pathānyatra samānanyāyam ūhyatām. "When the poor eye of the supplicants has once fallen upon thy face, then, O king, it looks no longer on the face of any other. In this stanza the excelling quality of liberality is well recognised. In a way similar to this the udāratva should be expressed also in other cases."

There is, however, still another opinion regarding the guna in question, as mentioned in the next verse: $\int_{\text{aghyair visesanair yuktam udaram kaiscid isyate.}} vathā līlāmbujakrīdāsarohemāngadādavah.

"Some scholars hold as udāra what is endowed with epitheta ornantia, as: a toy-lotus, a toy-pond, a golden bracelet, etc."

8. Ojas.

I, 80: ojah samāsabhūyastvam etad gadyasya jīvitam, padye'py adākṣiṇātyānām idam ekam parāyaṇam.

"There is ojas where long compounds are employed. This (ojas) is the life of the prose $(-k\bar{a}vya)$. (But in the opinion) of the Gaudas, (ojas) is the only and highest aim also for (the $k\bar{a}vya$ in) verse".

As regards the definition of ojas Dandin agrees with Bhāmaha, who however, does not use the term quaa, and does not expressly confine it to prose alone.

In I, 81-85 the author specifies ojas:

"In so far as heavy or light syllables are in the majority, in the minority, or combined with each other, this $(ojas)^{16}$ is of a higher or a lower kind. It is to be met with in the $\bar{a}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{a}$ etc.

The Western Quarter whose sun-ray-cover is lying on the top of the setting mountain looks like a woman whose red and beautiful garment lies on the large breasts.

¹⁶ Tarkavāgīša explains tad in the text as meaning samāsabhūyastvam, but in my opinion ojas is meant.

In this way the Eastern (poets) employ speeches which are full of ojas, but the others acknowledge ojas of speeches, only if it is not confusing and is pleasant, as in the following verse":

payodharatatotsangalagnasandhyātapāņišukā, kasya kāmāturaņ ceto vāruņī na kariṣyati.

"Whose mood is not rendered love-sick seeing the Western Quarter, the garment of which the evening sun hangs on the slopes of the clouds (of the breasts)".

The first instance shows the ojas of the Gaudas, who are fond of long compounds also in verse; besides that, this sort of style is to be recognised by the chosen words. In the second example we have apparently another kind of ojas peculiar to the Vaidarbha-rīti. The plain ślistarūpaka (payodhara) bestows a certain charm upon the whole sentence. The long but soft sounding compound of the first line is balanced by the short words of the second.

9 Kānti.

I, 85 : kāntam sarvajagatkātam laukikārthānatikramāt, tacca vārttābhidhānesu varņanāsv api dṛśyte.

"A sentence is $k\bar{a}nta$, if it pleases all the world by not exceeding the bounds of the natural. And this (pleasing mode of expression) is to be noticed in dialogues as well as in descriptions."

The first kind is illustrated by I, 86: grhāņi nāma tāny eva taporāsir bhavādrsah, sambhāvayati yāny eva pāvanaih pādapāmsubhih.

"Those only are real houses which an ascetic like you honours with purifying dust of his feet".

The second kind (I, 87):

anayor anavadyāngi stanayor jṛmbhamānayoḥ, avakāso na paryāptas tava bāhulatāntare.

"O you with blameless limbs, on your bosom there is not room enough for your swelling breasts.

Dandin comments on these verses (I, 88): iti sambhāvyam evaitad višesākhyānasamskṛtam, kāntam bhavati sarvasya lokayātrānuvartinah.

"Matters like that become, because they are possible and endowed with the diction of a peculiar excellence, pleasant for every one who has to do with worldly affairs".

Something of hyperbole lies, of course, in the above given instances, but as every poetical description is based on atisayokti, and a matter-of-fact account of the actual state of things has but little to do with poetry, the ideas of the stanzas are pleasing and natural notwithstanding¹⁷.

The style of the Gaudas, on the other hand, contrasts greatly with Vaidarbhī as regards the naturalness of ideas, as it employs exaggerations to such an extent that they go quite beyond the usual limit. Dandin proceeds (I, 89-92):

"If one intends to express an idea by raising it metaphorically beyond the natural limit, then only the (over) clever¹⁸ are satisfied, but not the others; as:

¹⁷ There is also an arthalamkara called atisayokti.

¹⁸ Vidagdhā must be understood ironically, Tarkavāgīša says vidagdhāh vidagdham manyamānā Gaudā ity arthah; sollumthanoktir iyam.

Our house has to be revered from this time on as the abode of a god, because its sins are entirely washed off by the falling dust of your feet.

The creator has made too narrow the world, not considering that your breasts would grow to such an amplitude.

This is called exaggeration; it is favoured very much by the Gaudas, but the method explained above is the kernel of the other (Vaidarbha) style".

Thus kanti of the Vaidarbha and atyukti of the Gauda are in contrast with each other.

10 Samādhi.

1, 93, 94: anydharmas tato'nyatra lokasımānurodhinā, samyag ādhīyate yatra sa samādhiḥ smṛto yathā. kumudāni nimīlanti kamalāny unmiṣanti ca, iti netrakriyādhyāsāl labdhā tadvācinī śrutih.

"If anybody, respecting the limits of naturalness, transfers a quality of one thing to another, it is called samādhi: as:

The day-lotuses shut their eyes and the night-lotuses open them¹⁹. In this instance we find the metaphorical transference of the function of the eye (to the shutting and opening of lotuses), a term which designates this (the function of the eye)".

Here also, says Dandin, one should respect naturalness. The commentary gives an instance of bad adhyāropa: vṛṃhanti mašakā yatra tatra nidrā sudurlabhā. "Where the mosquitos are trumpeting, there is hardly any sleep to be found". By transferring the function of trumpeting, peculiar to elephants, to the mosquitos the limits of naturalness are too far transgressed.

This is, however, not a quite correct rendering of the Sanskrit terms nimilanti and unmisanti.

In the next verses Dandin points out that in a metaphorical way even those words can be used, the placing of which is prohibited in a literal sense, as niethīv, udgr, vam, which all mean "to spit".

The metaphorical use of more than one quality at the same time is also permitted (I, 96b-98):

"Even a transference of several qualities at the same time is desirable: These rows of clouds, which are tired by bearing the heavy embryo and grown (thunder), lean against the lap of the slopes.

The leaning against the lap of the female friend, groaning, (feeling of) heaviness, fatigue: all those manifold qualities of a pregnant woman are (metaphorically) pointed out in this example".

The adhyāropa or adhyāsa described above makes up a great part of poetry, and here lies a certain difficulty of rendering it into another language, for by translating in the first instance nimīl and unmis by 'to close and to open the eyes' we express too clearly what the Sanskrit terms give in a more suggestive way. Pointing out the high importance of samādhi Daņdin says (I, 100):

tad etat kāvyasarvasvm samādhir nāma yo guņah, kavisārthah samagro'pi tam enam anugacchati.

"The whole troop of poets should aim at the guna called samādhi, which is the quintessence of the kāvya".

Dandin's dealing with rīti winds up with the stanzas I. 101, 102:

"In this way both styles (Vaidarbhī and Gaudīyā).

differ from each other on account of their peculiar characteristics. But their further differences, as they are met with in (the compositions of) the various poets, cannot be described (on account of their being too manifold).

Great is the difference between sugar-cane, milk, molasses, etc.; but even Sarasvatī would not be enabled to point out that (difference)".

Thus Dandin has at full length refuted the view of Bhāmaha, who was inclined to deny the difference of rīti. In the opinion of Dandin the style of Vaidarbha is better, because it is endowed with the ten guṇas described fully by the author. The differences between Vaidarbhī and Gaudīyā were in fact certainly not so great as Dandin would have us believe, but he is influenced by a prejudice against his predecessor.

Generally speaking, the theory of $r\bar{\imath}ti$ as described by the author of the $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}dar\dot{\imath}a$ was acknowledged by later scholars, though there were many dissenters with respect to particulars. Even Vāmana, who in many cases has followed Bhāmaha, concedes not only the differences of style but is of opinion that the style is the soul of poetry (I, 2, 6: $r\bar{\imath}tir\ \bar{a}tm\bar{a}k\bar{a}vyasya$). He attempts to present a definition of $r\bar{\imath}ti$ (I, 2, 8):

višistā padaracanā rītih,,

"A specified arrangement of words (is called) riti. According to Vāmana there are not two but rather three different styles, the differences of which are evident, the third being Pāñcālī. This statement is of some interest and of some importance with regard to kāvya literature. The author has something to say about the origin of ritis (I, 2, 9 and 10 vriti).

"There rises a question: Do the gunas (which characterise the different kinds) of kāvyas originate in different countries, that they are called after the names of countries (Vidarbha, Gauda, Pāńcāla), as certain material products (come from certain countries)? (We answer:) No! For (the sūtra runs): They are called Vaidarbha etc., because they are met with in different countries as Vidarbha etc., (that is) because they are used in their pure form by pcets in the countries of Vidarbha, Gauda and Pāńcāla, therefore these ways of diction are called after the name of the countries; but the countries by themselves have by no means any effect upon the (form of) Kāvyas."

Vāmana agrees with Dandin not only on this point that the differences of rīti are founded on the gunas²⁰, but that among the rītis Vaidarbhī is the best. Vaidarbhī is endowed, he says, with all gunas (I, 2, 11: samagragunopetā Vaidarbhī). With respect to the superiority of Vaidarbhī the author quotes the following ślokas:

aspṛṣṭā doṣamātrābhiḥ samagraguṇagumbhitā, vipañcīsvarasaubhāgyā vaidarbhī rītir iṣyate.

tām etām kavayah stuvanti:

sati vaktari saty arthe sati śabdānuśāsane, asti tan na vinā yena parisravati vānmadhu.

"That rīti is called Vaidarbhī which is untouched

20 Vāmana's treatment of the gunas which differs widely from that in the Kāvyādarśa, will be discussed in another place.

by even the slightest faults, furnished with all the gunos, and which sounds sweetly as the notes of a lute.

The kavis prajse it:

There may be a speaker, there may be a (good) sense (or tenor), there may be (a usage of words which is correct according to) grammar—without the (Vaidarbhī) the honey of speech will not flow".

This style is illustrated by a stanza from $Sakuntala^{21}$.

gāhantām mahişa nipānasalilam sringair muhus tāditam chāyābaddhakadambakam mrgakulam romantham abhyasyatu,

visrabdhaiḥ kriyatām varāhapatibhir mustākṣatiḥ palvale viśrāntim labhatām idam ca sithilajyābandham asamaddhanuh.

"The buffalloes may wallow in the water, striking it again and again with their horns; the flock of deer may ruminate in the shadow of the wood; the great boars may uproot without fear the pools' grass; and this bow of mine may rest with loosened string".

This instance shows that Vaidarbhi by no means avoids every compound absolutely but later on we shall meet a special kind of this style, where there are no compounds at all.

Gaudīyā is endowed with but two guņas: ojas and kānti (I, 2, 12: ojaḥkāntimatī Gaudīyā). The commentary says a little more:

"As Gaudiyā is devoid of mādhurya and saukumārya, it has long compounds and harsh sounding words. There is the following stanza:

The learned ones, well-versed in style, praise

²¹ Act II, ed. Cappeller, p. 19.

Gaudiyā as a way of expression which has (long) compounds and high sounding words and which therefore is endowed with the gunas, ojas and kānti.

The following stanza from Bhavabhūti's Mahāvīra-carita (I, 54) is quoted as an instance of Gaudīyā: dordaņdāncitacandrasekharadhanurdaņdāvabhaugodyatas ţankāradhvanir āryabālacaritaprastāvanādindimah drākparyastakapālasampuṭamitabrahmānḍabhānḍodarabhrāmyatpinditacandimā katham aho nādyāpi viśrāmyati.

"Alas! Even now the twanging sound of the bow-string does not stop, (the sound) produced by the breaking of Siva's bow, which he bent with his arms, (the sound of) a drum for glorifying Rām's youthful deeds, (the sound) the heaped-together-wrath of which rumbles through the world in the vessel of the Brahman-egg, (the world) which lies torn asunder between the rapidly burst shells".

Comparing this stanza with the above quoted words of Kālidāsa's the characteristic feature of Gaudīyā becomes very obvious. There is scarcely a possibility of lengthening the compounds still more than is done by Bhavabhūti. The mode of expression appears to be very stilted and the words are not the usual ones².

Pāncāli, the last of the rītis mentioned by Vāmana, possesses the two guṇas mādhurya and saukumārya (I, 2, 13). The vrtti says:
ojahkāntyabhāvād anulbanapadā vicchāyā ca, tatra ca ślokaḥ:

ojaḥkāntyabhāvād anulbaṇapadā vicchāyā ca, tatra ca slokaḥ aśliṣṭaślathabhāvāṃ tu purāṇacchāyayānvitām, madhurāṃ sukumārāṃ ca pāñcālīṃ kavayo viduḥ.

Reading Bhavabhūti's dramas one will find that the stanzas therein are of a type similar to the above mentioned. They are, however, not throughout of the same kind; but, on the whole, the rīti of this poet's work is Gaudīyā.

"As the Pāncālī does not show ojas and kānti, it has no high sounding words and is without brilliance. There is a śloka:

The wise ones call $P\bar{a}\bar{n}c\bar{a}l\bar{\imath}$ sweet and tender, which is endued with mildness and resembles the style of $Pur\bar{a}nas$.

Example:

grāme' smin pathikāya pāntha vasatir naivādhunā dīyate rātrāv atra vihāramaṇḍapatale pānthaḥ prasupto yuvā, tenotthāya khalena garjati ghane smṛtvā priyām tat kṛtaṃ yenādyāpi karaṅkadaṇḍapatanāśaṅkī janas tiṣṭhati.

"Traveller, in this village no wayfarer is allowed to dwell now. (Once) a young traveller slept at night under the roof of this pavilion. When the cloud was thundering, the wicked one rose, remembered his beloved, and did something by reason of which even to-day people constantly fear the falling-down of the skeleton" 23.

After having spoken of the particular qualities of the single rītis Vāmana goes on to deal with the relation of Vaidarbhī, Gaudīyā, and Pāñcālī to each other. The poet should cling to the Vaidarbhī, because only this mode of expression is possessed by all gunas, but not to the two others, as they have but a few of them (I, 2, 14, 15). The opinion of some scholars, according to whom the poet should practise in the other rītis and may so become a master in Vaidarbhī, is refuted by Vāmana, who says that if one limits oneself to the unreal, one cannot attain the real (tattva); a weaver, who weaves only with jute, how can he get skill in the weaving of silk (I, 2; 16-18).

²³ As this stanza appears to have been quoted from a poem we do not know, the context is doubtful.

Thus, the Vaidarbhī is the best rīti, and there is, says Vāmana, a special kind of it, described in I, 2, 19-21:

sāpi samāsābhāve śuddhavaidarbhī, tasyām arthaguņa-sampadāsvādyā, tadupārohād arthaguņaleśo'pi.

"Vaidarbhī is called pure Vaidarbhī, if there are no compounds. In this (pure Vaidarbhī) the richness of arthagunas comes to be tasted. Even the slightest arthaguna (is to be tasted), when connected with the (pure Vaidarbhī, to say nothing of the entirety of the arthagunas)".

The commentary gives the following lines:

"In the (Vaidarbhī) there is an incomparable arrangement of words, where even what is nothing becomes something, as it were. When it reaches the wise one's ear, it causes delight; it enters the heart like a stream of nectar.

Such 'ripeness' $(p\bar{a}ka)$, pleasing the hearts of men of taste, results from the Vaidarbha style that the beauty of words quickens, and that even the unreal acquires a reality".

There are two other passages in Vāmana's book where the term $p\bar{a}ka$ is mentioned. Rājašekhara dealing with vyutpatti, goes into detail concerning the $p\bar{a}ka$. On a previous occasion the matter in question has been spoken of 24.

Finally, Vāmana says with respect to this most excellent kind of diction (I, 1, 22):

²⁴ See above p. 51.

sāpi vaidharbhi tātsthyāt; and the vṛtti: sāpīyam arthaguņasampad vaidarbhīty uktā; tātsthyād ity upacārato vyavahāram daršayati.

"This richness of arthagunas is even called (metaphorically) Vaidarbhī, because (those gunas are to be found in the (Vaidarbhī and nowhere else)".

Let us now turn to Rudrata. Bhāmaha and Dandin have described two rītis: Vaidarbhī and Gaudīyā; Vāmana presents a third: Pāncālī; in Rudrata's Kāvyālaṃkāra we meet a fourth: Lāṭīyā.

But there is a remarkable difference between Rudrata's treatment of the ritis and that of his predecessors: Rudrata does not judge the mode of expression from the standpoint of guna, but from that of the structure of compounds.

Rudrata in the second book defines kāvya as a union of word and sense. After having stated that there are four categories of words, he continues (II, 3-5):

"Nouns are twofold, compounded or not compounded. When the nouns take the shape of compounds, then we have three ritis.

They are called Pāñcālī, Lāṭīyā and Gaudīyā, as they have short, medium, and long compounds, respectively.

We have Pāācālī when there are compounds of two or three words, Lāṭīyā, when there are compounds of about five to seven words; there is Gaudīyā where compounds are formed by as many words as possible".

Verbs prefixed by prepositions are not considered as compounds in this sense; these prepositions are used only to modify the meaning of the verb (II. 6º: ākhyātāny upasargaih samsrjyante kadācid arthāya).

The above described three ritis are in contrast to the diction of Vaidarbhi; II, 6^b :

vṛtter asamāsāyā vaidarbhī rītir ekaiva.

"When the words are compounded, then we have but one riti, the Vaidarbhi".

That is all Rudrata has to say about ritis. His treatment of matters apparently shows that the doctrine of riti has lost a great deal of its former significance and importance, and that it was no longer founded upon geographical differences and upon the existence on contemporary compositions belonging to a certain style. Any poem might have verses in different ways of diction, according to the sort of compounded words met therein. Vaidarbhi was thought the finest style, and had in course of time put all the others in the background. As Rudrata's Vaidarbhi contains no compounds, it resembles the śuddha-Vaidarbhī of Vāmana.

Rājašekhara in his Kāvyamīmāṃsā (adhyāya 7, p. 31) mentions only three rītis: Vaidarbhī, Gaudīyā, and Pāñcālī, which he considers as the three forms of speech (rītirūpaṃ vākyatritayam), without giving any further explanations. Rājašekhara appears, as regards these three rītis, to be influenced by Vāmana. For the author of the Kāvyamīmāṃsā another factor is of much greater importance, that is the manner of recitation and the change of pronunciation which bears the name kāku. As kāku is reckoned under the sabdālaṃkāras by Rudrata (which opinion is not shared by Rājašekhara), it must be described on another occasion, when we treat the history of the alamkāras.

. In the time of Mammata the doctrine of rīti became of still less significance. Though in the Kāvyaprakāsa the whole domain of poetics is treated exhaustively, rīti is touched on only by the way. It is mentioned twice: first in the eighth ullasa. where Mammata refuses to accept Vamana's opinion regarding the gunas, and secondly in the ninth ullasa. Here, the śabdālamkāras are defined. The anuprāsa, the author says, is twofold being cheka- and vrttyanuprāsa, the latter consisting in the repetitions of the same consonants. According to the various sorts of consonants there are three kinds of this anuprāsa: 1. upanāgarikā: the repeated consonants suggest mādhurya; 2. parusā: the consonants are the cause of oias: 3. komalā: when the sounds are of a kind different from those of the two mentioned. Now the author says that in the opinion of Vamana etc. the three kinds of rīti Vaidarbhī, Gaudī, and Pāñcālī are based on those three kinds of vrttyanuprāsa. It appears from the statements that the doctrine of riti, though of great importance in the period of Dandin (the greatest defender of the difference of dictions), had retained only a mere historical interest.

THE DIVISION OF POETRY

The division of poetry (kāvya) had always been a matter of great interest for the Indian teachers of poetics. Before going into details we have to examine from which points of view the division of the kāvya has been made.

Bhāmaha, who deals with the matter immediately after the definition of kāvya is given, presents a division according to the following standpoints: (i) prose and verse (gadya and padya). (ii) the language the composition is written in; that is Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Apabhramsa. (iii) the subject matter: anything which has really happened, which is invented by the poet's imagination, the domain of arts, and, finally, that of śāstra. (iv) The shape of the work as a whole: śargabandha, abhineyārtha, ākhyāyikā, ķathā and anibaddha.

In the work of Dandin the divisions are arranged a little better: the author divides according to only two points of view, which are (1) gadya and padya, and (2) the language. The other kinds mentioned by Bhāmaha are brought under the groups gadya or padya, so that sargabandha, both ākhyā-yikā and kathā, and abhineyārtha (nāṭaka), and campū (not mentioned by Bhāmaha) are but subdivisions of padya (verse), of gadya (prose), and of a combination of both padya and gadya, respectively.

Vāmana, too, gives only two main divisions, but not in the same way as Dandin; these are:

7. gadya and padya; 2. anibaddha and nibaddha. Anibaddha is that kind of poetry which consists of verses each distinct in itself (e. g. the satakas are of this kind); nibaddha, on the other hand, is a poem, where the whole of the stanzas forms the content. Poetry in prose is according to Vāmana, threefold: vritagandhi, cūrna, and utkalikāprāya, which division is not respected by later ālamkārikas. Sargabandha etc. are not mentioned, and nothing is said about the different languages.

Rudrața, again, has another standpoint. A kāvya is a combination of word (sabda) and sense (artha), and as Rudrata describes both subjects separately throughout, the division of kāvya is to be met with in two different passages of the Kāvyālamkāra: in the second and in the sixteenth adhyāya. Under the heading sabda we find gadya and padya. and, further, the division with respect to the language; under the heading 'artha' the classification according to the content: utpādya (where the subject is invented by the poet) and anutpadya (where the subject is known). This last idea is, however, not quite new, as it had already been presented by Bhāmaha. A second principle of division is the greater or lesser extension of the composition (prabandha). Mahākāvya, ākhyāyikā, and katkā are reckoned under utpādya poetry.

Though the ways of classification greatly differ from each other in some respects (the authors of the alamkāra tāstra endeavouring to present new ideas), the general principles are the very same everywhere. Then only, when poetry was considered from a higher point of view (that of dhvani), the above mentioned classifications were no longer placed in the foreground. They were, however, not considered as incorrect or false, but they were of only little interest (vaicitrya, which term had been employed already by Vāmana in a similar connection) for the scholars of more 'modern' times. If anybody wished to inform himself regarding those divisions, he was referred to the older masters, who had treated the matter fully.

Thus Mammata teaches that there are three kinds of poetry: superior (uttama), medium (madhyama), or inferior (avara) poetry, according to the superiority or inferiority of the 'unspoken'.

In Rajasekhara's Kāvyamīmāmsā there are ideas we do not meet with in any of the former works on alamkāra. Though the author's explanations are, for the greater part, of little value, and though, strictly speaking, they ought not to be treated here, because they deal with the division not of kāvya but of vākya, we will give a short account of them. Speech (vākya = vacana), says Rājasekhara, is, according to what the author is, either brāhmya, or saiva, or vaisnava. There are five divisions of the first kind: the speaker may be Brahman himself, the isvaras (the Bhrgus, etc., who are descended from Brahman's mind), the sons of the isvaras (the reis), the offsprings of the reis, and, finally, their sons. Examples may be taken from the Puranas. But according to the view of the kavis (Rājašekhara continues) speech (vacas), as it is found in the Vedas, is called parametrara and later on, divya, because the gods (deva) and those beings who are of divine origin (devayoni: vidyādhara, apsaras, yakşa, rakşas, gandharva, kimnara, siddha, guhyaka, bhūta, and piśāca) act as intermediaries. With respect to this, four kinds of speech are especially of importance: vaibuddha, vaiduādhara, gāndharva, and yoginigata. The form of the compounds is partly decisive here. There are some interesting peculiarities: The Pisacas (attendants to Siva) should speak in their own sphere Sanskrit, but on earth Bhūtabhāṣā; the language of the Apsaras is Prakrit. That is according to Rajasekhara important, because there appear gods, etc. in the nāṭakas. Divya is in contrast to Vaisnava. The language called Vaisnava has come to earth by means of the incarnations of Vāsudeva, so that it is commonly called mānuşa. With respect to the riti speech is threefold: Vaidarbhī, Gaudīyā, and Pāñcālī, but the way of recitation (kāku) gives rise to varieties of these three kinds.

We will return to Bhāmaha in order to see in which way poetry has been divided by him. He says (I, 16):

śabdārthau sahitau kāvyam gadyam padyam ca tad dvidhā, samskṛtam prākṛtam cānyad apabhramsa iti tridhā.

"Word and sense combined are $k\bar{a}vy\alpha$. It is twofold, prose and verse; it is further threefold, as it may be composed in Sanskrit, in Prakrit or in another (idiom) different (from those), viz. Apabhramsa."

1. Gadya and Padya.

According to D and in there are not two kinds, prose and verse (as Bhāmaha thought), but three (Kāvyādarša I, 11°):

padyam gadyam ca miśram ca tat tridhaiva vyavasthitam.

"The (body of the $k\bar{a}vya$) is threefold: verse, prose, and mixed (verse and prose)."

It is also worth noting that Dandin does not begin with gadya, as Bhāmaha did, but with padya. As is said in I, 31 the $n\bar{a}takas$ and other compositions belong to the $mi\acute{s}rak\bar{a}vyas$.

As to padya the author comments (I, 11^b, 12): padyam catuṣpadī tac ca vṛttam jātir iti dvidhā. chandovicityām sakalas tatprapañco nidarsitah, sā vidyā naus titīrṣūṇām gambhīram kāvyasāgaram.

"Padya is a stanza consisting of four metrical feet; and the padya is of two kinds: vrtta (i. e. metres wherein the syllables are counted), jāti (metres wherein the moras are counted). In prosody all the varieties of metre have been described: this knowledge is the ship for every one who is willing to cross the profound kāvya-ocean."

Vāmana is of the same opinion as Bhāmaha, stating (I, 3, 21):

kāvyam gadyam padyam ca.

"The kāvya is in prose and in verse."

That the miéra of Dandin is contained therein follows from the further description of Vāmana; gadya is named first (as was done by Bhāmaha),

I From this stanza some scholars (Jacobi, Peterson) would gather that Chandoviciti is the title of a third work of Dandin's; but Chandoviciti is a common term for 'prosody'. See note 14 on page 49.

because it presents more difficulties in the opinion of the author². Thus Vāmana corroborates the opinion of the master.

There are, according to Vāmana (I, 3, 22) three kinds of gadya. When verses occur occasionally in the prose, it is called vṛttagandhi. This is the mièra of Daṇḍin. Cūrṇa is called that sort of prose the words of which are pleasing and do not form too long compounds (I, 3, 24): anāviddhalalitapadaṃ cūrṇam³. Utkalikāprāya being the reverse of the latter has long compounds and high sounding words. As we have seen before these qualities are peculiar to different styles; utkalikāprāya shows a very great similarity to gaudīyā.

Padya is, of course, divided into many kinds, but no further detail is given by Vāmana⁴.

Rudrața as well as Bhāmaha and Vāmana deals only with the two kinds gadya and padya, which, however, are not divisions of kāvya itself, but rather of what kāvya consists of and what is called kāvyaśarīra by Daṇḍin. Considering that according to the Kāvyaādarśa śarīra is defined as padāvalī (a series of words), and that in Rudraţa's opinion the vocal expression of kāvya is the sentence (vākya), it appears that the theories of both Daṇḍin and Rudraṭa are almost the same in this point. Rudraṭa says (Kāvyālamkāra II, 11):

² gadyasya pūrvam nirdešo durlaksyavišesatvena durbandhatvāt, tathāhuḥ,—gadyam kavīnām nikasam vadanti.

³ Vṛtti: anāviddhāny ad Irghasamāsāni lalitāny anuddhatāni padāni yasmims tad anāviddhalalitapadam cūrņam iti.

⁴ Vrtti: padyam khalv anekena samārdha-sama-vişamādinā bhedena upetam bhavati.

vākyam bhavati dvedhā gadyam chandogatam ca.

"The sentence is twofold, prose and verse."

Mammata does not mention this division in his Kāvyaprakāśa at all.

2. Sanskrit Prakrit and Apabhraméa

Bhāmaha's second division (I, 16) is determined by the idiom the kāvya is composed in⁵. The stanza is of some interest on account of the word apabhram-śa⁶. Apparently Bhāmaha does not understand by this term one special language, but rather, a group of several idioms, which widely differ from Sanskrit. This is suggested by the name itself. If this is right, prākrta does not mean a class of idioms, but a certain dialect; and this dialect is probably the māhārāṣṭrī, which without doubt in the period of Bhāmaha had a very great importance as a language in which poetical compositions were written.

As in my opinion Dandin was a younger contemporary of Bhāmaha the literary facts spoken of in the Kāvyādarśa are, generally, the same as those we met with in the work of Bhāmaha. We find indeed (the suggestion mentioned above corroborated in the Kāvyādarśa. Daṇḍin mentions (I, 32) Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Apabhraṃśa, which three idioms are employed for literary purposes. Let us see what Daṇḍin has to say concerning Apabhraṃśa.

⁵ The stanza (Bhāmaha I, 16^b) is quoted by Namisādhu, commenting on Kāvyālamkāra II, 11, in the following form prākṛtam saṃskṛtam caitad apabhraṃsa iti tredhā. The incorrectness of this appears already from the anteposition of prākṛtam. The difficulty lies in anyad. Another translation of this important verse than the one given above is scarcely possible.

⁶ Of the more recent investigations on Apabhraméa, I may here mention two papers by Prof. Jacobi: Bhavisatta kahā von Dhanavāla (Abhandlungen der Kgl. Bayer. Akad. D. Wiss., Philos.-philol. Kl., Vol. 29, 4), and Sanatkumāra-caritz (ib. Vol., 31, 2). The former paper is in many respects supplemented and corrected by the latter.

I, 36: ābhīrādigirah kāvyeşv apabhramša iti smṛtāh, śāstreşu saṃskṛtād anyad apabhramšatayoditam.

"In the kāvyas the idioms of the ābhīras etc. are considered as apabhramsa. But in the sāstras that is called Apabhramsa which differs from Sanskrit".

According to this statement, the word apabhraméa has a double meaning. In the éastras, and especially in the books on poetical theories, and thus in the work of Bhāmaha all languages which are different from Sanskrit are united under the name of apabhraméa. There is little doubt that, that was in the older period the meaning of the word, and that only in the course of time the word assumed a more pregnant and particular sense, perhaps then, when the 'best' Prakrit, māhārāṣṭrī, was used as a language fit for literary compositions. Then the scholars retained the older meaning of the word, whilst in common use the term prākrta, once the designation of a determinate language (māhāraṣṭrī),

7 Tarkavāgīša thinks the term ābhīra not a nomen proprium, but rather used in a professional sense: cowherd. He says: kāvyeşu nāṭakādiṣu ābhīrādigiraḥ ābīrīprabhṛtayo gopacāṇḍālasakārādīnāṃ vyavaharaṇīyā bhāṣā apabhraṃsa iti smṛtāḥ apabhraṃsanāmnā bhāṣānirūpakair nirūpitāḥ. But this is probably not the case.

took the place of 'apabhraméa'. It 'apabhraméa' was mentioned in the kāvyas something different from the apabhraméa of the éāstras was meant, viz. such dialects as were a good deal less important and lower than the vernacular of the ābhīras etc., in which idioms scarcely any literary works were composed in the period of Bhāmaha and Dandin. The home of the ābhīra-language was, as is stated by Taruṇavācas pati, one of the commentators on the Kāvyādaréa, in Western India⁹.

With respect to the various dialects Dandin says (I, 33):

saṃskṛtaṃ nāma daivī vāg anvākhyātā maharṣibhiḥ, tadbhavaḥ tatsamo dešīty anekaḥ prākṛtakramaḥ.

"Sanskrit is the divine language, taught by the great sages. The variations of Prakrit are numerous, being tadbhava (come forth from that, i. e. Sanskrit), tatsama (similar to that), or belonging to certain regions."

From the term desi we may gather that the word Prākṛta is used here in a wider sense including also Apabhraṃśa. Taruṇavācas patī, however, thinks that the Māgadhī language is meant (desī iti māgadhī gṛhyate). The author of Hṛdayaṅgama comments: desī povallī iti kramukanāmā, cassiṃsī iti kañcanasyanāma, dogghaṭa iti gajasya nāma. This Prakrit in

- 8 Prof. Pischel in his famous Prakrit Grammar quotes, (p. 1) an observation by Śamkara to Śakuntalā 9, 10, saying: saṃskṛtāt prākṛtaṃ śreṣṭhaṃ tato' pabhraṃśabhāṣaṇam.
- 9 The commentary of Hrdayangama has another interpretation: ābhīro nāma paścimārṇavatīre vartamāno deśaviścṣaḥ, athavā ābhīrādayaḥ gopālādayaḥ.

the word's wider sense is in contrast to Prakrit in the narrower sense, (I, 34:)

mahārāṣṭrāśrayām bhāṣām prakṛṣṭam prākṛtam viduḥ, sāgaraḥ sūktiratnānām setubandhādi yanmayam.

"As the most excellent Prakrit the language of Mahārāṣṭra is considered. The Setubandha etc., the ocean of jewels of good sayings, is composed therein."

Other variations of Prakrit are mentioned in I, 35: saurasenī ca gaudī ca lātī cānyā ca tādṛsī, yāti prākṛtam ity evam vyavahāreşu samnidhim.

"Saurasenī, Gaudī, Lāṭī and other dialects of this kind are as 'Prakrit-variations' met with in the dialogues (in nāṭakas etc)."

As to the division caused by the difference of the languages Dandin states that from this point of view four kinds of $k\bar{a}vya$ must be distinguished (not three, as Bhāmaha had said):

tad etad vāmayam bhūyah samskṛtam prākṛtam tathā, apabhramsas ca misram cety āhur āptās¹o caturvidham.

"This (body of the $k\bar{a}vya$) formed by the languages is further taken by the authorities as being fourfold, as far it is Sanskrit, Prakrit ($M\bar{a}har\bar{a}str\bar{i}$), Apabhramsa, or mixed (dialects)¹".

In the next stanzas the question is answered, in which manner the various idioms are peculiar to the different sorts of poetical compositions:

saṃskṛtam sargabandhādi prākṛtaṃ skandhakādikam, āsārādīny apabhraṃśo nāṭakādi tu miśrakam.

¹⁰ I prefer this reading to $\bar{a}ry\bar{a}\hat{s}$. The Tibetan translation has a word which means 'clever, expert'. With respect to $\bar{a}pta$ compare $K\bar{a}vy\bar{a}dar\hat{s}a$ II, 22f.

¹¹ tad evam vānmayam refers to sarīra in I, 9. Bhīīyas goes back to stanza 10.

"A sargabandha etc. is in Sanskrit; compositions in the metre skandhaka etc. in Prakrit; compositions in the metre āsāra etc. in Apabhraṃśa, but nāṭakas etc. are in mixed dialects".

By the word tu the importance of the new kind 'misra' (which is not found in Bhāmaha's) is, as it were, underlined.

Kathāpi sarvabhāṣābhiḥ saṃskṛtena ca badhyate, bhūtabhāṣāmayīm prāhur adbhutārthām bṛhatkathām.

"The $kath\bar{a}$, too, is composed in all languages and in Sanskrit. The $Brhatkath\bar{a}^{12}$ with its wonderful tenor is said to have been composed in the idiom of the ghosts".

Vāmana and also, be it mentioned here already, Mammata had said nothing about the languages. We turn therefore to Rudrata. Bhāmaha and Dandin had pointed out (though differing from each other in details) that there were three groups of idioms: a kāvya may be composed in Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Apabhramsa. Rudrata mentions six languages, saying (Kāvyālaṃkāra II, 11, 12):

was already unknown even to Dandin. I do not believe that the plural sarvabhāṣābhiḥ is of a peculiar significance (Prof. Jacobi, Bhavisattakahā, p. 42). One must bear in mind that the above quoted stanza refers directly to Bhāmaha I, 28. Bhāmaha had taught that the kathā (with regard to which more will be said later on) is composed in Sanskrit and, partly, in Apabhramśa. Dandin replies: no, that is not correct; it is composed in all languages and in Sanskrit. The term samskṛtena ca is nothing more than an appended note with a delicately hinted irony against Bhāmaha.

bhūyo'pi,

bhāṣābhedanimittaḥ ṣoḍhā bhedo'sya sambhavati. prākṛtasaṃskṛtamāgadhapiśācabhāṣāś ca sūrasenī ca, ṣaṣṭho'tra bhūribhedo deśaviśeṣād apabhraṃśaḥ.

"Further, there is a sixfold division of the (vākya) according to the languages; these are: Prakrit, Sanskrit, Māgadha, Pisāca, and Sūrasenī; the sixth, Apabhramsa is divided into many kinds according to the various countries".

From this it is evident that 'Prākrta' does not denote a group of languages, but rather one language, the same one as mentioned by Dandin, which appears to have frequently been used in poetical compositions, the Māhārāṣṭrī. For if that were not the case it would be impossible to explain, why Māhārāṣṭrī is not mentioned by Rudrata. Māgadha was not named by Dandin, perhaps because it was of less importance as a literary idiom in his time. Apabrhamsa is, on the whole, probably the same as that Apabhramsa in the Kāvyādarsa, when it is spoken of in kāvyas (not in sāstras).

The older $V\bar{a}gbhata$ has the following remarks about the languages ($V\bar{a}gbhat\bar{a}lamk\bar{a}ra$ II, 1-3):

"Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramáa, and the language of the Bhūtas: these four languages become the body of the kāvya.

Sanskrit is the language of the gods; it is settled in the grammars. Prakrit is variously divided, as far as it originates in (Sanskrit) is similar to it, differing with respect to dialects etc.

Apabhramáa, in its pure shape, is spoken in various regions. What is spoken by the Bhūtas (the Piśācas) is called Bhauta (Paiśācika)".

xviii

Thus Vāgbhata comprises by the term $Pr\bar{a}krta$ several idioms, which, however, are in some way or other connected with Sanskrit. According to the commentary of Simhadevagani Saurasenī and Māgadhī is meant by ādi. Prakrit is set in contrast to Apabhramśa. In its pure form it is found, says the commentary, in the countries of the Karnāṭas and Pāñcālas. With regard to the last group, the Bhauta or Paiśācī is little known. Vāgbhata was perhaps thinking of the Brhatkathā, which was referred to already by Dandin.

In a supplementary way (because they have nothing to do with the division of poetry) some very interesting observations of Rajasekhara concerning the different kinds of recitation may be mentioned here 13. After dealing the mode of recitation (pātha) generally the author goes on to point out what sorts of recitation are peculiar to the different countries. People from Magadha and others from the country lying eastward of Benares have a good pronunciation of Sanskrit, but are 'blunt (kuntha)' when they speak Prakrit. Of the Gaudas, Rājašekhara does not speak well. Their recitation of Prakrit is, according to him, very bad. The Gauda Brahmins recite neither very distinctly (atispasta), nor 'legato (āślista)', neither roughly $(r\bar{u}ksa)$ nor very tenderly (atikomala), neither with a high (atitara) nor with a deep (mandra) voice. Karņātas recite, which soever the rasa, the rīti, or the guṇa may be, with an elevated, and at the end, with a twanging voice (tamkāra). All Dravidian poets in verse as well as in prose compositions use a musical mode of recital (geyagarbhe sthitah pāthe sarvo'pi dravidah kavih). The author is very pleased with the beautiful Prākṛta-pronunciation of the Lāṭas, who hate Sanskrit¹4. The Surāṣṭras, Travanas, and others recite Prakrit well, but their way of speaking Sanskrit has something of an Apabhramsa note¹5. The people of Kashmir, says Rājasekhara, are good poets but the author ridicules their pronunciation, which sounds, he says, as if they had the mouth full of Gudūcīs¹6. The poets who dwell westward of them, in Uttarāpatha, though well educated, speak with a nasal twang (sānunāsikapāṭhinaḥ). Finally, Rājasekhara praises the beautiful (subhaga) recitation of the Pāñcālas, for whom he shows great sympathy also elsewhere.

¹³ Kāvyamīmāņsā, 7th adhyāya.

3. The Subject matter.

With respect to the division based upon the subject matter, Bhāmaha says (I, 17):

"The kāvya is also fourfold, as it praises the past deeds of gods etc., or the subject matter is to be invented (by the poet), or the subject matter is formed by the arts, or (finally) by the sāstras.

Though the alamkārašāstra, after the time of Bhāmaha, has not conserved this division of poetry, we shall come back to these ideas more than once later on.

- Paţhanti laṭabham laṭaḥ prakṛtam saṃskṛtadviṣaḥ, jihvayā lalitollapalabdhasaundaryamudrayā.
- 15 Apabhramáavadamáani te samskrtavacamsy api.
- 16 Sāradāyāḥ prasādena kasmīraḥ sukavir janaḥ, karņe gudūcīgandūṣas teṣām pāṭhakramaḥ kimu.

4. Sargabandha, Abhidhānārtha, Ākhyāyikā, Kathā, Anibaddha.

This division of poetry is much more important than the previous ones. Bhāmaha says (I, 18):

"Kāvya etc. is said to be fivefold: sargabandha, abhidhānārtha, ūkhyāyikā, kathā, and anibaddha".

A. Sargabandha, a composition which is divided into sargas.

I, 19-23:

"Sargabandha is a mahākāvya, dealing with great (persons)¹⁷, large, the words of which are not vulgar¹⁸, which has good sense, adorned with figures of speech, based on real events¹⁹; it is endowed with the description of a counsel-meeting, of (the sending of) a messenger, of a campaign, of a battle, and of the (final) triumph of the hero; it is furnished with the five sandhis²⁰, needs no extensive explana-

¹⁷ In a stanza mentioned below, note 30, on p. 143 there is said:

mahākāvyam prayoktavyam mahāpuruşakīrtiyuk.

¹⁸ Grāmya is well explained by Vāmana II, 1, 7: lokamātraprayuktam grāmyam.

¹⁹ As 'real' must of course also be considered such tales met in the itihāsas, which bear the stamp of reality on account of the holiness of tradition. Itihāsas are in contrast to such tales which have originated in the poet's imagination.

Dasarūpa I, 34 ff. The five sandhis are: mukha, pratimukha, garbha, avamarṣa (Bharata: vimarṣa), upasamh ti (Bharata: nirvahaṇa). See also Bharata, Nātyaśāstra XIX, 35 ff. The question cannot be discussed here, whether all the five sandhis are necessary for a kāvya. At any rate we see from the words of Bhāmaha to which degree later poetics have been influenced by the older doctrine of the drama.

tion, is rich (with poetical value); though it has to do with all the four vargas (dharma, artha, kāma, mokṣa), it gives, above all, instruction in artha. It describes things as they happen in the world, and it is endowed with all rasas, (but) separately. The poet, after having described the hero's race, energy, fame etc., should not describe his destruction in order to praise thereby the high qualities of another person. If the hero is not described in such a way that he fills the body of the kāvya throughout, then, indeed, the mention of him in the eulogy in the beginning (of the kāvya) is in vain".

The last two stanzas do not touch on the definition of the mahākāvya (sargabandha). They have been caused by some differences of views, which will be clearer only after having learned Dandin's account concerning the matter.

Daṇḍin's treatment of it is based on Bhāmaha's. He says (Kāvyādarśa I, 14—19):

alamkṛtam asamkṣiptam rasabhāvanirantaram, sargair anativistīrṇaiḥ śravyavṛttaiḥ susandhibhiḥ. sarvatra bhinnavṛttāntair upetam lokarañjakam, kāvyam kalpāntarasthāyi jāyeta sadalamkṛti.

"Sargabandha is a mahākāvya²¹. These are its peculiarities: It begins with an āśis, a namaskriyā, or an indication of the contents²². It is based on ²¹ Tarkavāgīša: mahākāvyam sargabandhah, tasya sargair nibadhyamānatvāt.

²² Āŝis is the benediction (Tarkavāgīša: āŝiḥ iṣṭajanasya ŝubhāŝamsanam. Compare Kāvyādarŝa II, 357, where āŝis is defined as an alamkāra. Namaskriyā is the respectful salutation). Tarkavāgīša mentions that the Kīcakavadha a story from the *itihāsas*²³, or on another theme, based on a fact²⁴; it is endowed with the success of the four *vargas*²⁵. The hero is clever and exalted²⁶. It is adorned with descriptions of a town, of the ocean, of a mountain, of a season, of the rising of sun and moon²⁷, further, of sport in park or in water, of drinking, of love-feasts, of separations²⁸, of weddings, of the development of a son, with descriptions, of a counsel-meeting, of (the sending) of a opens with an āsis, the Raghuvamsa with a namaskriyā, and the Śisupālavadha with a vastunirdesa.

- 23 Above all Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaņa as Tarkavāgīša and Vidyāsāgara say.
- 24 Tarkavāgīśa says that the telling of an invented story in the mahākāvyas is prohibited (sadāśrayam ity anena kalpitavṛttāntasya mahākāvye varṇanam pratiṣiddham); and Vidyāsāgara: itarad rāmāyaṇamahābhāratādivyatiriktam api etena asatyavṛttam mahākāvye na varṇamyam iti pradarśitam,
- 25 The commentary adds that it is not possible that all the four vargas succeed in one place. Thus the poet should describe all the four vargas indeed, but the fruit of only one among them (tathā caturṇāṃ dharmārthakāmamokṣāṇāṃ vargas caturvargaḥ, tadrūpeṇa phalena prayojanenopetam ekarta caturṇāṃ phalatvāsambhavāt sarve punar varṇanīyāḥ paraṃ tv anyatamam eva phalam iti mantavyam, uktaṃ ca catvāras tatra vargāh syus teṣv ekam ca phalam bhaved iti).
- 26 Tarkavāgīśa: tathā caturo vyavahārakuśala udātto dhīrodātto nāyakah kathāvyāpipradhānapuruso yatra tat.
- 27 Of course the description of sun and moon-set, too, though it is not mentioned expressly by Dandin.
- 28 The plural is used (says Tarkavāgīśa) in order to indicate that there are several kinds of separation (vipralambhair iti bahuvacanena tasya pūrvarāgamānapravāsakarunātmakatayā caturvidhatvam sūcitam.

messenger, of a campaign, of a battle, and of the final triumph of the hero²⁹; it is not too compressed (with respect to the description), is penetrated thoroughly by the rasas (sentiments) and bhāvas (emotions), divided into sargas which are not too long³⁰, endowed with metres agreeable to the ear³¹, at the end of which the metre changes³², and the sandhis of which are good³³: such a kāvya that has

- 29 Tarkavāgī sa: mantrādipancakam kramikam tathā hi prathamam mantraņā tato dūtapreṣaṇam tataḥ prayāṇam tato yuddham tatas ca ripujayādirūpābhyudayaḥ.
- 30 Vidyāsāgara thinks that by anativistīrņaih the number of the sargas (not the length) is meant: śāstraniyamitāstādibhih tad uktam Īśānasanhitāyām:—

astasargān natu nyūnam trimsatsargāc ca nādhikam, mahākāvyam prayoktavyam mahāpurusakīrtiyuk.

- 31 śravyavrttair iti hatavrttatādidoşaparityāgena mādhuryādiguņasadbhāvena ca vairasyānavahasrutisukhadavrttair ity arthaḥ, says Tarkavāgīśa.
- 32 Tarkavāgīśa has a twofold interpetation, the first being: bhinnavṛttāntaiḥ pṛthakpṛthag avāntarakathā-prakāśakaiḥ. According to this, the poet should insert some episodical stories, but that is certainly not correct. The second interpretation alone is the correct one:

yadā bhinnam vṛttam pṛthakchandonibaddhaḥ śloko' 'nte' avasāne yeṣām taiḥ, ekena chandasā sargam nirmāya chando 'ntareṇa samāpayed ity arthaḥ, uktam ca ekavṛttamayaiḥ padyair avasāne 'nyavṛttakaiḥ.

33 One might be inclined to translate susandhibhih by "the connections of which are good", i.e., the connection between the end of one and the beginning of the next sarga should be pleasing, unconstrained, and natural (as Tark avāgīša comments: susandhibhih suślistasandhānaih bhāvisargasāpekšair ity arthah. Vidyāsāgara is of the same opinion). There can be no doubt, however, that Daṇḍin takes up Bhāgood alamkāras and that (on account of its being as described) delights the world, may last till the end of the kalpa."

Comparing these words with Bhāmaha's description of the mahākāvya, Dandin's dependance on Bhāmaha is evident. Several terms are borrowed verbatim, as sargabandho, mahākāvyam, sadāśrayam, mantradūtapravānājināvakābhvudavaih. As a matter of course, Dandin, on the one hand, is anxious to complete the definition of Bhamaha and on the other, to omit what in his opinion are no characteristic features of this kind of composition, as the terms aurāmyaśabda and arthya. These are indeed superfluous as they are characteristic not only of the sargabandha but also of the other sorts of poetry. There are new points, Dandin thinks, necessary for the definition of mahākāvya: so that the poet should begin with an āśis, a namaskriyā, or a vastunirdeśa. Whether bhāvas and rasas are of importance even for sargabandha-compositions or not, is a question which is perhaps not answered in the affirmative for the bhava has its proper place in the drama, on account of which the doctrine of bhava is developed in the books dealing with the dramas. As to the rasas they belong originally to the drama too, but they have been transferred to the kāvya already pressly: nāṭakasandhayaḥ.

maha's pañcabhih sandhibhir yuktam again and that it must be translated as above; and in this sense is Tarkavāgīśa's second interpretation: yad vā sandhayo nāṭakalakṣaṇoktā mukha-pratimukha-garbha-vimarṣa-nirvahaṇākhyāḥ pañca. See also Sāhityadarpaṇa VI, 317, where the author says exvery early. Some three 'sentiments' are even considered, but certainly erroneously, as alamkāras84. Regarding the things the poet should describe in the mahākāvya, Dandin goes into more detail than As a matter of fact all the famous Rhāmaha mahākāvyas contain such episodic descriptions as are mentioned in the Kāvyādarša. They are typical of the sargabandha and ought not to be wanting therein. Therefore they must be named, as is done by Dandin. Bhamaha has mentioned only those descriptions which form, so to speak, the political content of the kāvya. That this must be considered as the foundation may be gathered from the fact that Dandin simply quotes the exact words of Bhamaha concerning this matter. The four vargas among which artha is preferred by Bhāmaha, are of similar significance. Bhamaha says nothing about the metre. The postulation, that at the end of every sarga the metre has to change, is not quite new. There are some cases in the Vedic hymns where the poets like to wind up with one or more stanzas the metre of which is not the same as that of the preceding verses⁸⁵. In the later literature we find the same method almost everywhere. This change of metre appears to have taken place to suggest to the hearer the coming end of the sarga⁸⁶. The want of punctuation is supplied as it were in that way.

³⁴ Preyas, Rasavat, Ūrjasvin; Kāvyādarša II, 275.

³⁵ Compare H. Oldenberg: Die Hymnen des Rigveda. Vol. 1, Metrische und textgeschichtliche Prolegomena, pp. 441ff.—There is, to mention it by the way, a second method of indicating the end of a chapter, viz., to repeat the last words. Thus we find it in the Upanisads. One must, however, bear in mind that these are, for the greater part, prose texts.

According to Dandin the poet has to draw attention to and to be aware of very many things, so that a young poet may become discouraged, if he has to fulfil conscientiously all requirements. But he need not be so. Dandin continues comforting the poet by the words (I, 20).

nyūnam apy atra yaih kaiścid angaih kāvyam na duṣyati, yady upātteṣu sampattir ārādhayati tadvidah.

"When some of these components are wanting, a $k\bar{a}vy\alpha$ does not become bad, if only the success in those things which are described satisfies the learned."

Up to this point we find no great difference between Dandin's teaching and that of Bhāmaha, but as to the nāyaka, the hero of the kāvya, the views of both scholars diverge from each other. The way Bhāmaha deals with the hero leaves little doubt that he opposes an opinion of some other ālaṃkārikas before or contemporary with him. The poem, says Bhāmaha, should end with the hero's triumph; it would be absurd, if the poet praised the excellences of some other person in the kāvya, through whom the chief-nāyaka would perish finally. Dandin, always desirous to go against Bhāmaha, says (I, 21, 22):

guņatah prāg upanyasya nāyakam tena vidviṣām, nirākaraņam ity eṣa mārgaḥ prakṛtisundaraḥ.

36 Though this need not be proved I may draw attention to the fact that even in earlier times (e.g. by the author of the Sāhityadarpana) the whole domain of kāvva is divided into ŝravya and drŝya, poetry to be heard and poetry to vaṃśavīr yaśrutādīni varņayitvā ripor api, tajjayān nāyakotkarṣavarṇanaṃ ca dhinoti nah.

"It is a naturally pleasant way, if the hero, after his excellent qualities have been described, conquers his enemies. But we are, on the other hand, pleased, too, when the poet, after he has set forth the race, heroism, fame, etc. even of the enemy, describes the brilliant qualities of the $n\bar{a}yaka$, so that he vanquishes the (so described) enemy."

The partly literal congruence of these two stanzas with Bhāmaha's I, 22³⁷ makes it evident that Dandin blames no one else but Bhāmaha, though in this case, the words of Dandin do not bear the stamp of open aggression³⁸. There Dandin's hidden attack shows again a peculiar form, twisting the meaning of Bhāmaha's words, for, according to the Kāvyādarša we would assume that Bhāmaha had stated that the poet should not make the enemy's (pratināyaka) excellent qualities the subject of a detailed description. But this is not so. For, though in the opinion of Bhāmaha the nāyaka ought to wholly 'fill' the body of the kāvya, the chief point is this that the poet should not describe the hero's fall in order to be seen. The mahākāvyas etc. belong to the former, the nātakas to the latter sort of poetry.

³⁷ Dandin: gunatah prāg upanyasya nāyakam, Bhāmaha: nāyakam prāg upanyasya. Dandin: vamsavīryasrutādīni, Bhāmaha: vamsavīryasrutādībhih, this last is comprised in Dandin's gunatah. Even Dandin's nāyakotkarsavarnanam refers obviously to Bhāmaha's anyotkarsābhidhitsayā.

³⁸ Thus Tarkavāgīša, who did not know the work of Bhāmaha, could not see any polemical tendency in the above mentioned stanzas of Dandin, praise thereby the excellent qualities of his enemy. That this is the standpoint of Bhāmaha is proved by the tenor of stanza I, 23.

While Vāmana has not given a definition of mahākāvya, because in his opinion the division of kāvya into kathā, ākhyāyikā, and mahākāvya is of no special interest³⁹, Rudraṭa presents a very exhaustive description of it. This scholar considers the poetical compositions as twofold, utpādya and anutpādya as far as the subject of the poem is invented by the poet himself or is taken from the itihāsas⁴⁰. The mahākāvya is an utpādya composition, and described by the stanzas (XVI, 7—18):

"As to the utpādya composition one may in the mahākāvyas begin with the description of a beautiful town. Then, (the poet) should praise the descent of the hero therein (in that town). He must set forth a hero who follows the three vargas (dharma, artha, kāma), who possesses the three abilities (prabhušakti, mantrašakti, utsāhašakti⁴¹), and all the excellent qualities, whose subjects are devoted to him⁴², who ³⁹ Vṛtti to I, 3, 22: yad uta kathākhyāyike mahākāvyam iti, tallakṣaṇaṃ ca nātīva hṛdayaṅgamam ity upekṣitam asmābhih, tad anyato grāhyam.

⁴⁰ Kāvyālaṃkāra XVI, 2, 3. A second division is given in XVI, 2-6: mahat and laghu. These compositions are taken as mahat, where all the four vargas and all rasas are to be found. This division and many others of the later ālaṃkārikas too are of small importance and interest. In their endeavours to discover new ideas scholars could not be lucky in every case.

⁴¹ See e. g. Raghuvamŝa III, 13; VI, 33; XVII, 63; Siŝupūlavadha II, 26.

⁴² Or: whose ministers are devoted to him.

is desirous of victory. He should describe the whole kingdom of the hero, who rules in due form, and his behaviour as a king; if opportunity offers, he should (describe) a season, autumn, etc., in connection (with the hero). Out of the high families he should paint an adversary of the hero, who is anxious to promote the dharma both for himself and for his friends. (an adversary) who is endowed with excellent qualities. Hearing from his spy, who has been sent out by him, or from another side of enemy's intentions, (the hero) may cause excitement in the assembly of the kings (so that) their thoughts and speeches are inflamed by anger. After having consulted together with his ministers and having resolved that (this enemy) ought to be punished, then (the poet) should let the hero unertake a campaign or let him send a loquacious messenger. Then, when a campaign is undertaken, (the poet) should paint the excitement of the women in the town, (further) the mountains and rivers of the countries, the woods, the forests, the lakes, the deserts, the oceans, the dvipas and the continents43. (The poet should further describe) the encampments of the army and, according to the circumstances, the sport of young people therein44, the sunset, the dawn, the darkness, the rising of the moon, the night, and, therein, meetings, concerts, drinking, and love. In due time, the poet may resume (the thread of) his tale. In the same way he may describe the adversary, as he approaches, as he arrives, or as he, forced by circumstances, besieges a town. Then the poet should let the warriors, who fear death, send messages in the night, which they spend wholly in drinking, thinking that they have to die the next day, to their wives. When both (the hero and his enemy), after having prepared for the struggle, fight hard with each other, the poet should finally well describe the triumph of the hero."

⁴³ The other worlds, say Namisādhu.

⁴⁴ Viz. in the woods, rivers, etc., which are enumerated in the previous lines.

If one compares this 'definition' with those of Bhāmaha and Dandin, Rudrața's dependance on both becomes evident. However, though it is very long, Rudrața's definition can scarcely be called a progressive one. On the contrary, we miss various points in it, which are important marks of the composition called mahākāvya, as the occurrence of alamkāras, of rasas, the division into sargas, the change of the metre, while, on the other hand, the author introduces some points which are not inherent or necessary parts of the division. This is, however, sometimes a peculiarity of definition of the Indian theorists, whatever their speciality be, that they draw some points of a more incidental and accessory character into their definitions and do not render the real essential features prominent enough, though they are very seldom entirely left out.

In spite of the similarity of the definition of both Dandin (and Bhāmaha) and Rudrata, there is, really, a small divergence, though, perhaps, more theoretically than practically. It has already been mentioned, that, according to Rudrata, the mahākāvya belongs to utpādya-poetry, that is, that the poet himself is the inventor of the subject-matter of the kāvyašarīra. But Bhāmaha and Dandin have said that the kāvyas should be based on facts, to which also such stories as are sanctioned by tradition and are told of e.g. in the Rāmāyana and Mahābhārata belong. It is true, however, that these older scholars already thought of a more stereotyped form, when they speak of mantradūtaprayānājināyakābhyudaya.

These are more general outlines allowing the poet a wider scope in the development of the story as a whole. All the other points mentioned by Bhāmalın and, still more in detail by Dandin, are meant to give a poetical charm to the description of the story. The impression we gain from Rudrata's statements is different. He prescribes so to speak, a norm for the development of the story. Thereby the story itself is pushed into the background and the poetical ornament is considered the main point of the mahākāvya. The action ceases to be interesting compared with the way it is told in. Thus, the working poet has to concentrate his whole attention on the form, to which he should give his own individual stamp.

The definition of mahākāvya has scarcely altered in course of time. Some five hundered years after Rudrata the Sāhityadarpaṇa⁴⁵ says as follows:

⁴⁵ The author of the Sāhityadarbaņa divides the whole domain of kāvya into many parts. Though this subdivision is only of smaller interest, it may be given here shortly, because Viśvanātha appears to have borrowed from older works. The kāvya is (I)drśya (to be seen) and (II) śravya (to be heard). The drama belongs to the first kind, and is divided in many ways. The śravya-kāvya is (i) padya (in verse) and (ii) gadya (in prose). The description of padya is introduced by an account

"An arrangement of sargas is called mahākāvya. The one hero therein is a god or a keatring of noble family, firm, exalted, endowed with good qualities46, or there may be several heroes; princes sprung from one 47 race, of a noble origin. Among the of the names given to one detached stanza and collections of stanzas: muktaka (one stanza), vugmaka (two), sandānitaka (three,) kalāpaka (four), and kulaka (five stanzas, which form Then padya is subdivided: (I) sargabandha = one whole). mahākāvya (example: Raghuvamsa, Śiśupālavadha, Naisadha, "my Rāghavavilāsa"); (2) ākhyāna (when the sargas are composed by a rei: (Mahābhārata); (3) āśvāsa (when the sargas are written in Prakrit, the metre being mostly askandaka, galitaka: (Setuban iha, "my Kuvalayūśvacarita"); (4) kadavaka (when the sargas are written in Apabhramsa: (Karnaparākrama). (5) Kāvya (written in many languages and not divided into sargas: (Bhiksātana, Aryāvilūsa); (6) khandakāvya (when the conditions of the mahākāvya definition are only partly fulfilled: (Meghaduta); (7) kosa (a collection of stanzas which do not depend on each other: (Muktāvalī). As to gadra, the author remarks that there are four kinds of prose: muktaka (without compounds), v"ttagandhi (containing metrical parts), utkalikāṣrāya (long compounds), and cūrnaka (short compounds). With regard to that one may compare Vamana's treatment of gadva, (see above p. 127). Gadva is divided into: 1 kathā, 2 ākhyāvikā, 3 campū (in prose and in verse, as the Dasarājaca. rita), 4 biruda (praise of a king, in prose and in verse: Birudamaninmālā), 5 kasambhaka (in different languages: "my Prasastiratnāvalī, composed in sixteen languages").

- 46 Pramadādāsa Mitra translates: "characterized by firmness and generosity of heart" but we must separate udātta from guṇa, as is suggested also by the corresponding words of Daṇḍin.
- 47 Though eka can also be rendered by "excellent", the above given translation seems to be better. Of course, the rasas, śringāra (love), vīra (heroism) and śānta (calmness) one should be the chief rasa and all (the other) rasas should be subordinate to it. (The mahākāvya) contains all sandhis of the drama. The story is founded upon the itihāsas or another one, (but of such a kind that) it is connected with good persons. It contains the four vargas (dharma, artha, kāma, moksa), and of these the poet should describe one as being the goal48. In the beginning there is a namaskriyā, āśis, or vastunirdeśa49. Sometimes it opens with the reproof of bad men etc. and the praise of the excellent qualities of the good men. It consists ot sargas, which are neither too short nor too long, more than wight⁵⁰ (sargas) everyone of which is nāyakas must be connected in some way or other in order to save the unity of the action. It would be possible to compose a kūvya the heroes of which are both Rāma and Laksmana.

- 48 Pramadādāsa Mitra gives the following translation: "It has for its fruits (i. e. the final objects obtained by the hero or the like) all the four of the class consisting of the great objects of human desire, vis. Merit, Wealth, Enjoyment, and Liberation, or it has only one of them." But there is little doubt that the meaning is the following: Although the mahākāvya deals with all the four vargas, the fruit of only one of them is described.
- 49 Pramadādāsa Mitra renders vastunirdesa by "or simply with the mention of a matter (leading into the main story of the poem)", but vastu is nothing more than the subject-matter of any poetical composition (Apte, Dictionary, s. v.]; vastunirdesa, then, means contents. The Raghuvamsa begins with a vastunirdesa.
- 50 From this interesting remark it appears that at the time of Visvanātha, Kalidāsa's Kumārasambhava was already written in one metre, but there should be a change of the metre at the end (of the sargas). In some cases, however, a sarga composed in various kinds of metre is to be seen. At the end of the sarga there should stand a hint of what will happen in the next sarga. Dawn, sun, moon, night, evening, darkness, day, morning, midday, hunting, mountain, season, wood, joys of love, saparation, muni, heaven, town, sky⁵¹, battle, campaign, wedding, counsel, birth of a son, etc., all that should be described together with angas and upāngas⁵², according to circumstances. The mahākāvya should receive its title after the poet, the hero, or some other, and the sargas should be named after what is described therein."

It is evident that this definition, which contains scarcely anything new, is dependent on Dandin. Like Dandin, Visvanātha also begins with the words sargabandho mahākāvyam. Ādau namaskriyā vastunirdeša eva vā is the same as: āšīr namaskriyā vastunirdešo vāpi tanmukham of the Kāvyādarša; itihāsodbhavan vṛttam anyad vā sajjanāśrayam repeats only Dandin's itihāsakathodbhūtam itarad vā sadāśrayam⁵³. Viśvanātha's catvāras tasya vargāh syus teşv ekam ca enlarged and had more than eight sargas, for it has never been doubted that the Kumārasambhava must be considered as a mahākāvya.

⁵¹ Pramadādās a Mitra renders adhvara by sacrifice.

⁵² i. e. everything that is connected with the just mentioned subjects either directly or indirectly.

⁵³ The author, however, interprets the former part of sad-āśraya by "good." This is not the opinion of Dandin.

phalam bhavet corresponds to Dandin's caturvagaphalopetam, and sambhogavipralambhau is only the inversion of vipralambhair vivāhais ca⁵⁴.

B. Abhineyārtha.

The second kind of literary composition is 'abhineyārtha', i.e. to be acted or dramatically represented. It is the nāṭaka. The writers on alaṃkāra agree that it should not be treated in the books on poetics but in those which deal with the dramatic art. Thus Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin refer the reader to the literature thereon. Bhāmaha says (I, 24):

"As regards the nāṭaka, which is divided into dvipadī, śamyā, rāsaka, skandhaka, etc., one says that it should be acted. Other scholars have treated (the nāṭaka) in detail."

And Dandin, (Kāvyādarsa I, 31): misrāni nāṭakādīni teṣām anyatra vistarah.

"Mixed (i. e. in prose and in verse) are the nāṭakas etc. A detailed description of them is to be found elsewhere" 55.

The same author notes in I, 37 that natakas are written in various languages.

nagarārņavasailartucandrārkodayavarņanam, udyānasalilakrīdāmadhupānaratotsavāh, vipralambho vivāhas ca kumārodayavarņanam, mantradūtaprayāņājināyakābhyudayā api, etāni yatra varņyante tan mahākāvyam ucyate.

That is nothing else than the old definition, but a good deal more superficial.

⁵⁴ In the Prataparudriya (p. 96) the mahākāvva is described by the following words.

⁵⁵ It is worth noting that both Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin use exactly the same term vistara.

Vāmana (I, 3, 30) only says that dramas (dasarapaka) are the best of all literary compositions⁵⁶.

C. Ākhyāyikā and Kathā.

According to $Bh\bar{a}maha$, both $\bar{a}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{a}$ and $k\bar{a}th\bar{a}$ are the third and fourth kind of composition. The author has (I, 25-29):

prakṛtānākulaśravyaśabdārthapadavṛttinā, gadyena yuktodāttārthā socchvāsākhyāyikā matā. vṛttam ākhyāyate tasyāṇ nāyakena svaceṣṭitam r vaktraṃ cāparavaktraṃ ca kāvya-r bhāvyarthaśaṃsi ca kaver abhiprāyakṛtair aṅkanaiḥ kaiścid aṅkitā r, kanyāharaṇasaṃgrāmavipralambhodayānvitā. na vaktrāparavaktrābhyāṃ yuktā nocchvāsavaty api, saṃskṛtasaṃskṛtā ceṣṭā kathāpabhraṃśabhāk tathā. anyaiḥ svacaritaṃ tasyāṃ nāyakena tu nocyate, svaguṇāviṣkṛtiṃ kuryād abhijātaḥ kathaṃ janaḥ.

"That kind of literary composition is called $(\bar{a}khy\bar{a}-yik\bar{a})$, which is composed in prose, the words of which ⁵⁶ Dasarūpaka is, in the opinion of Vāmana, the wider, the first group of which is the nāṭakas.

⁵⁷ Quoted by Tarkavāgīša in his commentary to Kāvyā-darša I, 24; the second line (with the v.l. yasyāṃ for tasyāṃ) also by Vidyāsāgara commenting on the same stanza of Daṇḍin's.

Thus We may read instead of kāle. Šankara, commenting on the tenth introductory stanza of the Harracarita, quotes the verse in this way: etasmin (viz. in the metre vaktra) ākhyāyikāki dbhir bhāvivastusaṃsūcanāya vāg viracyate, tathā ca Bhāmahaḥ, vaktraṃ cāparavaktraṃ ca kāvye kāvyārthaśaṃsini iti. From this sentence the correct reading must be concluded.

⁵⁹ TrivedI: *kṛtaiḥ kathā (tha?) naiḥ kaiścid ankitā. Tarkavāgiśa (commentary to Kāvyādarśa I, 30) quotes the line as follows: kaver abhiprāvakṛtair ankanair ankitā kathā.

⁶⁰ Trived I. has samskrtam samskrtā.

(as the bearers of ideas) express the matter intended, the meaning of which is not confused, and the words of which (as combinations of sounds) are pleasant to the ear, and which is divided into ucchvāsas⁶.

In the (ākhyāyikā) the hero himself narrates his deeds. (Stanzas written in the metre) vaktra and aparavaktra indicate what will happen next in the (course of the) kāvya.

The kathā shows characteristics which spring from the poet's imagination. It contains the description of the seizing of a girl, (the description) of a struggle, of the separation and the (final) triumph of the hero.

It contains no (stanzas in the metre called) vaktra and aparavaktra, nor is it divided into ucchvāsas. It is written in Sanskrit, and also partly in Apabhraméa.

In the kathā other (persons) recount the deeds of the hero. For how should a well-educated man set forth his own excellent qualities!"

different opinion. I bring the adjectives prakrta, anākula, and ŝravya together with ŝabda, artha, and pada respectively (yathāsamkhyam); then vrtti must be connected with pada as well as with ŝabda and artha. Prakrta in the sense of "belonging to the matter in question" is used very often by later writers on poetics, mostly however, in connection with artha (prastuta has the same meaning). Prakrta does not occur elsewhere in Bhāmaha's work. I confess, however, that I am not wholly satisfied with the translation given above. Manuscript T gives prasrta for prakrta which does not render the meaning clearer.

⁶² Tarkavägīša (commentary to Kāvyādarša I, 29) connects line 29k. wrongly with the ākhyāyikā.

It is not possible to gain a thoroughly clear idea of akhvāvikā and kathā from these stanzas, but what we may gather from this short account, is, probably, the following: Both akhyāvikā and kathā are written in prose (gadya). As to their tenor, these two kinds of compositions differ from each other on this point that the subject-matter of the akhyāyikā is what is experienced by the hero himself. This being the case, there is no restraint concerning the matter of the composition. The tenor of the kathā, on the other hand, is much more stereotyped in its outlines. The theme, or rather the disposition, is given: the seizing of a girl, a struggle caused by it, the separation of the two lovers, and finally and as a matter of course, the triumph of the hero, i.e. the happy union of the hero with his beloved wife. From this it is obvious that the poet's imagination takes a prominent part as regards the formation of the plot within the prescribed main points of the whole; and this is apparently meant by the author's words: kaver abhiprāyakrtair ankanaih kaiscid ankitā. the ākhyāyikā we have only to do with events which have really happened. Another remarkable distinction is the fact that in the ākhyāyikā the hero himself is the narrator or, if we dare say so, the reporter of his own deeds and experiences, while in the kathā the speaker is another person. Further, the ākhyāyikā is divided into several chapters which are called ucchvāsas. These ucchvāsas open with some verses in the metre named vaktra and aparavaktra, perhaps a couple of stanzas68, the former in vaktra, the latter

⁶³ I may be allowed to assume this from the terms in aparavaktra, which in some way or other point to what will be the tenor of the ucchvāsa in question. The kathā is not divided into chapters (ucchvāsas), nor are there stanzas in vaktra and aparavaktra. As regards the language there is an interesting remark of Bhāmaha to the effect that the kathā is written in Sanskrit and, besides that, in apathraméa. Taking into consideration what has been gathered from Bhāmaha I, 16, he does not mean a single language here by the term apathraméa but the Prakrit idioms in general. It is possible, though it cannot be proved, that Bhāmaha's prototype of kathā was the famous Brhatkathā, which according to Dandin was composed in the Paiśācī language

Bhāmaha's treatment of ākhyāyikā and kathā as two different kinds of gadya poetry is sharply criticized by Dandin, who says (Kāvyādarśa 1, 23, 24):

apādaḥ padasantāno gadyam ākhyāyikā kathā, iti tasya prabhedau dvau tayor akhyāyikā kila, nāyakenaiva vācyā 'nyā nāyakenetareṇa vā, svaguṇāviṣkriyā doṣo nātra bhūtārthasaṃsinaḥ.

"Gadya is a series of words without metre. Ākhyāyikā and Kathā are considered as two different kinds of it (gadya). Of these two the ākhyāyikā is to be narrated only by the hero alone, the other (kathā) by the hero or another person. Therein the setting forth of one's own excellent qualities cannot be taken as a fault of the nāyaka, if he recounts real things".

Dandin first deals with the interesting question regarding the person that by means of the poet's words narrates the story. The opinion of Bhāmaha, that in the kathā the narrator is not the hero, is rejected by Dandin, who states nāyakena itareņa vā. In the same way Dandin refuses to accept what Bhāmaha says in order to justify his idea that in the kathā another person than the hero should be the narrator: it is no fault when a person describes his own excellent qualities, supposing that he says the truth. There is one point, however, in which Dandin agrees with Bhāmaha, viz. that in the ākhyāyikā the hero himself is the speaker, for if this were not the case, Dandin must have mentioned it.

vaktra and aparavakıra, and from the words: . . . vaktrūparavaktre papūtha (Bāṇa's Harsacarita p. 115).

In the following three stanzas (I, 25-27) the author goes still farther in refusing to accept Bhā-maha's theories:

api tv aniyamo dṛṣṭas tatrāpy anyair udīraṇāt, anyo vaktā svayam veti kīdṛg vā bhedalakṣaṇam. vaktraṃ cāparavaktraṃ vā socchvāsatvaṃ ca bhedakam, cihnam ākhyāyikāyāś cet prasaṅgeṣu kathāsv api. āryādivat praveśaḥ kiṃ na vaktrāparavaktrayoḥ, bhedaś ca dṛṣṭo lambhadir ucchvāso vāstu kiṃ tataḥ.

"But farther, because also in the ākhyāyikā other persons (and not exclusively the hero himself) are speaking, no restriction can be seen regarding this point also. How can that be a distinctive mark whether another or himself is the speaker?

If the employment of the metre called vaktra and aparavaktra or the division into ucchvāsas should be considered as distinctive attributes, I may reply that even in the kathā, the āryā etc. occur occasionally, why should not vaktra and aparavaktra occur also? And the chapters may in this case be called lambha etc. in the second ucchvāsa, but what can be concluded from that?"

As Dandin gave a false interpretation of the words of Bhāmaha in the case of the sargabandha, so also here Dandin intentionally misinterprets the passage in question. Bhāmaha does not deny that there are occasionally other speakers than the hero himself in the $\bar{u}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{u}$, but they have to be, of course, introduced by the $n\bar{a}yaka$.

With respect to vaktra and aparavaktra as well as to the names of the chapters (ucchvāsa), Dandin seems to be more correct. For, what have these quite subordinate things to do with the characteristic features of ākhyāyikā and kathā? An examination of the question, however, shows that Dandin also in this case takes another standpoint than that which is the correct one for Bhamaha's treatment of the matter. Bhāmaha's words refer not to some stanzas in vaktra and aparavaktra, which occasionally occur in the story, but to those stanzas which form the headings of the chapters (ucchvāsa). The name of the metre (vaktra and aparavaktra) is by no means of the same importance, nor is the name of the chapters ucchvāsa; but there we meet with questions which will be examined later on.

Thus the author of the Kāvyādarśa insists that neither the person of the narrator, nor the kind of metre, nor the heading of the chapter is are essential peculiarity of ākhyāyikā on the one hand, and of kathā on the other. And so he says (I, 28°):

tat kathākhyāyikety ekā jātih samijnādvayānkitā.

"Thus kathā and ākhyāyikā ere only one sort of literary composition called by different names".

And, as Dandin's commentator Tarkavāgīśa remarks, "with an overbearing manner", the author looks down rather contemptuously on the master and says (I. 28^b):

atraivāntarbhavişyanti śesāś cākhyānajātayah.

"And there will be contained also the other kinds of stories" 64.

After having shown that the "peculiarities" of Bhāmaha's ākhyāyikā have no distinctive character in reality, Dandin goes on to prove that also what Bhāmaha teaches with respect to the kathā ought not to be accepted. According to Bhāmaha the description of the seizing of a girl etc. as well as some other "tokens" sprung from the author's imagination are characteristic features of the kathā. Dandin replies (I, 29, 30):

kanyāharaņasaṃgrāmavipralambhodayādayaḥ, sargabandhasamā eva naite vaišeṣikā guṇāḥ. kavibhāvakṛtaṇ cihṇam anyatrāpi na duṣyati, mukham iṣṭārthasaṃsiddhau kim hi na syāt kṛtātmanām.

"The description of the seizing of a girl, of a struggle, of the separation, of the hero's triumph, etc, met with in sargabandhas, too thus these are no distinctive qualities.

A special mark sprung from the poet's imagination is no fault also elsewhere. For what should not be a means for the learned ones respecting the complete attainment of the wished-for object"?

64 Tarkavāgīsa: atra atraivāntarbhavisyantīti bhāviprayogāt praudhivādenābhedapratipādanam granthakṛto na tu vastutaḥ prāmāṇikatamair munibhir api tattadbhedābhyupagamāt, yathā, āgneye,— "ākhyāyikā kathā khandakathā parikathā tathā kathāliketi manyante gadyakāvyam ca pañcadhā" iti, evam kathākhyāyikayor apy abhinnatvapratipādanam etanmūlakam cveti mantavyam.

Finally Dandin rejects Bhāmaha's view concerning the languages (I, 38):

kathāpi sarvabhāṣābhiḥ saṃskṛtena ca badhyate, bhūtabhāṣāmayīṃ prāhur adbhutārthām brhatkathām.

The kāthā, too, is composed in all languages and in Sanskrit. The Brhatkathā, which contains wonderful things, is said to be written in the language of the ghosts".

On a previous occasion it has been pointed out that the word apabhraméa is employed by Dandin in a narrower sense than by Bhāmaha. This being the case Bhāmaha's words get, of course, another meaning; and this modified meaning of Bhāmaha's is rejected by Dandin, when he uses the word sarvabhāsābhih.

The words samskrtena ca of Dandin can only be fully understood when they are compared with those of Bhāmaha. There is a shadow of irony in them; and Dandin rejects Bhāmaha's theory concerning this point giving an example from literature by referring the reader to the Brhatkathā. Unfortunately we know only little about this work, which must have been well-known in the period of the Kāvyādarša. That this story was composed in the Paišācī language is also stated by other authors.

Vāmana, though mentioning the two kinds of gadya ākhyāyikā and kathā, gives no further definition of them, because this division of $k\bar{a}vya$ is in his eyes of no interest.

⁶⁵ Paisācī,

⁶⁶ See Hall in the introductory pages of the edition of the Vāsavadattā (Calcutta 1859, Bibliotheca Indica).

In spite of Dandin's bitter attacks the younger writers on alamkāra were not willing to give up the theory of the old masters that two sorts of prose must be assumed. In fact the power of tradition was too strong to admit of alterations. Rudrata deals very exhaustively with the matter in question and gives the following account (XVI, 20-23):

"The poet, after having expressed his reverence for the desired gods and gurus in verse in the great kathā, should (also in verse) shortly⁶ describe his own family and his authorship⁶⁸. Then he should arrange in prose, which is endowed with anuprāsas and which has light syllables69, the body of the kathā as before (in the utpādyakāvyas), viz. descriptions of towns, etc. In the kathā he should give in the beginning either another story, well developed, and then, in an easy manner the connecting link in order to come to the main tale, or he should (without giving another story before) arrange the kathā in Sanskrit and in another (language), but, in the latter case, not in prose, (the kathā) the end of which is the winning of a girl, wherein the whole śringārarasa (the sentiment of love) is rightly developed".

The account concerning the ākhyāyikā is still more detailed (Kāvyālaṃkāra XVI, 24-30):

"The poet after having, as before (v. 20), worshipped

⁶⁷ Which is done at length in the ākhyāyikā.

⁶⁸ Namisādhu remarks: tena sujanakhalastutinindādikam cābhidadhyād iti sūcyate.

⁶⁹ Syllables with not too many consonants.

the gods and gurus, should praise the (former) poets in the ākhyāyikā, thinking that he is not able to compose a kāvya, after those (great poets) have existed. Then (as being the reason, why, notwithstanding, he proceeds to compose a kāvya) he may describe his devotion to the princes, or his fruitless effort to praise the excellent qualities of another, or he may give another, but not a trivial, reason, why he is composing the ākhyāyikā. Thereafter he should arrange the ākhyāyikā in prose as well as the kathā. And the poet may describe his own descent, but not in verse. As (the mahākāvyas) are divided into sargas, so he should divide (the ākhyāyikā) into ucchvāsas. In the opening of every (ucchvāsa), except the first 70, he may for the sake of the (main subject) mention two (verses in the) arya-metre, which are connected with each other and the tenor of which is a general idea.

Should there be the occasion to utter a doubt concerning a present or a past object, which is hidden, or concerning a future object, though it is manifest, the poet, in order to dispel the doubt, should in the presence of the doubting person let some body quote one or two of the alamkāras anyokti, samāsokti, or śleṣa. In this case he should use one of the metres āryā, aparavaxtra, or puṣpitāgrā, or according to circumstances any other, mostly mālinī."

In spite of the very detailed description the definitions of both kathā and ākhyāyikā contain scarcely any new idea. As to the introductory stanzas, however, Rudrata gives some interesting remarks. Bhāmuhu and Dandin mentioned nothing on this matter, so that it is doubtful whether for the ākhyāyikā and kathā of that older period the quoting of such introductory stanzas was prescribed or not.

⁷⁰ Where the just mentioned rules are to be observed.

On the other hand a very important question is not touched on by Rudrata, viz. whether the hero himself or another person is the narrator. If this point had been of interest still in the time of Rudrata, he would have mentioned it, Thus we cannot but assume that the question concerning the narrator was no longer considered as a characteristic feature of one of the gadya-compositions. With this we have, however, arrived at a point regarding which more will be said later on.

Other important writers on alamkāra consider kathā and ākhyāyikā as two different kinds of prosepoetry. The author of the Dhvanyālokalogana mentions them occasionally, without giving, however, any further description. Dealing with the arrangement of words (sanghatanā) Ānandavardhana states that the various sorts of sanghatanā depend on the length of compounds. There are (the author says on p. 134) three kinds of sanghatana, whether no compounds, short compounds, or long compounds are found. Which of these three sorts should be used is determined by the sort of composition (p. 141). Under these literary compositions sargabandha, abhineyārtha, ākhyāyikā, and kathā are mentioned. These are the very same groups and in the very same arrangement as are found in the work of Bhamaha. The rules regarding the prose compositions are of course different from those of the verse compositions. As to the prose all depends on the condition of the compounds. Thus the akhyayika is characterised by short and long compounds. Though with respect to the kathā it is similar in general, it should be borne in mind that in this sort of composition the rasas are described (sūtra III, 8). these circumstances, those rules are valid for the suitableness (aucitya) of compounds here which are taught with respect to compositions dealing with the rasas. So, in the case of srnaara-rasa long compounds should be employed (p. 135), in the case of raudra-rasa compounds are wanting. Sometimes sentiments as love, sadness, anger, heroisin occur also in the ākhyāyikā. Then, as a matter of course, the poet has to work according to the same rules, the arrangement of words depending always on the difference of rasas.

Visvanātha gives the following account (Sāhitya-darpana VI, 332-336°):

kathāyām sarasam vastu gadyair 11 eva virnirmitam. kvacid atra bhaved āryā kvacid vaktrāpavaktrake, ādau padyair namaskārah khalāder vṛttakīrtanam. Yathā kādanbaryādih.

edition instead of padyair, as the reading is in the edition of the Bibliotheca Indica. The stanza is quoted with the correct reading by Krishnamachariar in the introduction to Subandhu's Vāsavadattā (Srirangam 1906). Pramadādās a Mitra translates as follows: "In the kathā (tale) which is one of the species of poetical composition in prose, a poetical matter is represented in verse, and, sometimes, the Āryā and, sometime, the Vaktra and Aparavaxtra are the metres employed in it." This gives a wrong idea of Ākhyāyikā kathāvat syāt kaver vamsānukīrtamam, asyām anyakvīnām ca vrttam padyam kvacit kvacit. kathāmsānām vyavaccheda āsvāsa " iti badhyate, āryāvaktrāpavaktrānām chandasā yena kenacit. anyāpadesenāsvāsamukhe bhāvyarthasūcanam. Yathā harsacaritūdih.

'api tv aniyamo dṛṣṭas tatrāpy anyair udīraņāt' iti Daṇḍyäcāryavacanāt kecit 'ākhyāyikā nāyakenaiva nibaddhavya' ity āhuḥ, tad ayuktam, ākhyānādayaś ca kathakhyāyikayor evāntarbhāvān na pṛthag uktāḥ, yad uktaṇ Daṇḍinaiva: atraivāntarbhaviṣyanti śeṣāś cākhyānajātayaḥ'. eṣām udāharaṇaṃ pañcatantrūdi.

kathū, as this translation is based on the incorrect reading badvair. Peterson (edition of Kādambrī, Introduction -Part II, p. 69) rejects the translation of Pramadādāsa Mitra and thinks that the meaning is: "When . . . we turn back to the description of kathā, we find that species of composition distinguished as a narration in prose, with here and there a stray verse or two, of matter already existing in a metrical form." The last words are the rendering of padyair eva vinirmitam. Even supposing that the reading padyair is correct I think it impossible to translate as Peterson does. As a matter of course, all the hypotheses Peterson founds on this rendering of his, need not be The same is the case with respect to what discussed. Miss Ridding says in the translation of the Kādambarī, p. XII.

72 Though in Bāṇa's Harṣacarita the chapters are not called āśvāsa, but ucchvāsa, I cannot alter āśvāsa to ucchvāsa. In an older dictionary, Uttaratantra by name, from which some passages are quoted by Śivarāma in his commenary to Subandhu's Vāsavadattā, we find the following remark: ākhyāyikāpariccheda āśvāsocchvāsakāv api. These words are quoted by L. H. Gray, Journal of the American Oriental Society, Vol. 24, first half, 1903, p. 60. But L. H. Gray separates incorrectly ākhyāyikā pariccheda.

"In the kathā a rasa-containing 73 subject is described in prose. Sometimes a stanza in the kathā may appear in the āryā-metre, sometimes stanzas in vaktra and aparavaktra. In the beginning there should stand in verse a namaskriyā and a description of the behaviour of bad people and so on.

Example: Kādambarī etc.

The $\bar{a}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{a}$ is similar to the $kath\bar{a}$. An account of the poet's race, and, sometimes, a description of the deeds of their poets is presented therein. The division of the separate parts of the story is made by chapters, the names of which are $\bar{a}\acute{e}v\bar{a}sa$. The coming subject is indicated in any of the metres $\bar{a}ry\bar{a}$, vaktra, or aparavaktra in the beginning, but in such a way that the poet takes another matter as pretext.

Example: Harşacarita etc.

It is not right what some scholars say viz. that the ākhyāyika should be narrated by the hero. For Daṇḍin has taught: 'But farther because also in the ākhyāyikā other persons (and not exclusively the hero himself) are speaking, no restriction can be seen regarding also this point' (Kāvyādarša I, 25). Because the other kinds of prose compositions ākhyāna etc. are contained in kathā and ākhyāyikā, these are not described separately. For Daṇḍin has said: And there will be contained also the other kinds of stories.

Example: Pañcatantra etc."

⁷³ Pramadādāsa Mitra translates sarasam vastu by "a poetical matter", but the well-known "sentiments" singāra etc. are meant.

In these last words Viśvanātha states his agreement with Dandin, but, in spite of this fact, he does not revolve upon identifying ākhyāyikā and kathā. He goes only so far that he touches the theory of the narrator ⁷⁴ in the definition no longer.

As a whole, Viśvanātha's definitions are not satisfactory. Nothing is said concerning the subject-matter, a very important point in the view of the older masters. What we may gather from this is that the real and old distinctions of both ākhyāyikā and kathā were forgotten very long ago.

After we have seen in which way the two main kinds of prose have been defined by the writers on alamkāra, we shall make an attempt whether it is possible or not to obtain an idea of the real state of kathā and ākhyāyikā, what both have in common and in which points they differ from each other. Unfortunately we have no older authorities than Bhāmaha, for from Bhāmaha's treatment of the subject it appears that there had been discussions on the matter in question long before his time. It asargabandham api yad upakāvavam udīryate, asargabandharūpam—sūryasatakūdi. gadyapadyamayam kāvyam campūr ity abhīdhīyate, vaktram aparavaktrm ca socchvāsatvam ca bhedakam, varnyate yatra kāvyajāair asāv ākhvāvikā matā.

The Harsacarita is considered as an example. It is evident that the author is influenced by Dandin.

⁷⁴ The author of the Pratūparudrīya does not know kathā. After having defined mahūkāvya he mentions that there are gadya and padya-kūvyas. An example for the former is the Kādambarī, for the latter the Raghuvaṇṣṣa. Then he continues:

need not be proved that prose works must have existed before the period of Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin, which differed from each other on very important points, so that scholars were in a way right in calling these compositions by different names. The definitions given by the Indian scholars are, however, very often not of such a kind as to show what the real condition of things might have been, putting aside the chief characteristic features for points of less importance.

The ākhyāyikā seems to have been the older kind, out of which the kathā was developed as a peculiar form. In the opinion of the older masters four points are of particular importance; they are:

- 1 The subject matter,
- 2 The narrator,
- 3 The division into chapters called ucchvāsa,
- 4 Stanzas in the metre called vaktra and aparavaktra, which open every ucchvāsa (but not the first) and indicate its content.

We will first consider the last two points. Apparently it is not right to see the essential part of the definition in the name of the chapter (ucch-vāsa) and in the kind of the metre (vaktra and aparavaktra). But this is essential that the ākhyā-yikā was divided into chapters (they were usually called ucchvāsas), and that there were stanzas at the beginning of every chapter, with the exception of the first (it was, however, usual to compose these in the metre called vaktra and aparavaktra), the purpose of which stanzas was to give in one way or other a certain idea of what would happen in the ucchvāsa in question. The poet might be allowed, however, to quote some other stanzas; but these are of no importance for the disposition of the whole work, and have by no means anything to do with the characteristic features of the ākhyāyikā. In this incorrect way, however, the words of Bhāmaha are interpreted by Dandin, who, as we have seen and shall see on other occasions, is always endeavouring to find fault with Bhāmaha.

In dealing with the introductory stanzas something must be said concerning the metres called vaktra and aparavaktra. Even their names show that both are to be closely connected with each other, though we are not able to find out their origin. Vaktra is probably the simple śloka. This we gather from the rules Pingala (v. 9) presents concerning this metre. The term sloka itself is not used by Pingala. In the older language the word sloka meant not a certain metre but was the term for metre generally. Then vaktra became later on the designation of a certain form of epic sloka. The vaktra verse we find e. q. in Bāna's Harşacarita (Nirnaya Sāgara Press, p. 125) differs from the usual sloka only in so far that the penultimate syllable of the second and of the fourth $p\bar{a}da$ are long. Except this difference the form of the second and fourth pada is pathyā. Thus, the scheme of the vaktra is as follows:

I am inclind to assume that this metre rather is a younger invention, made when the term sloka was already employed instead of the old name. Now, the term vaktra is to be found in the old books on alamkāra, when akhyāyikā and kathā are spoken of. To do justice to these authoritative doctrines, the new metre vaktra was invented. The above mentioned stanza of Bāṇa's is combined with a second one in the metre called aparavaktra; both verses are introduced by the author's works: vaktrāparavaktre papāṭha, from which we conclude that both vaktra and aparavaktra were considered by Bāṇa as being connected in some way. In older times the form of aparavaktra was, however, not the same as later on, when in the Chandaḥśāstra the scheme was given as

As to the narrator of the story Bhāmaha had said that in the ākhyāyika the hero himself describes what he has done (vṛttaṃ ····· svaceṣṭitaṃ). Regarding this point there seems to be a difficulty. For the fact that in the kathā another person, but not the nāyaka, is the narrator, is explained by Bhāmaha, who says that a well educated man is never inclined to sing his own praises. Is this not, however, the very same case as regards the ākhyāyikā? Though here the hero himself recounts his deeds he is not blamed for doing so. But the case is far from being the very same. For, in the ākhyāyikā the hero relates real facts, which he has experienced himself, his own personal adventures (vṛtta). By doing so he gives, so to speak, an autobiography. Theoretically, he may describe not only his good but also his less good deeds and qualities. Thus we have not only to do with guṇāviṣkriyā here.

Matters are quite different in the kathā. The subject-matter of the kathā is invented, as we shall see afterwards. On account of this peculiarity the hero appears in quite a different light. As a matter of course he was presented as being endowed with as many excellent qualities as possible. When he had to be the speaker himself, then he could only praise his own good qualities. This was thought a fault (doṣa), because we have not to do with facts (vrtta) here. It is in agreement with Daṇḍin's statement, that the praise of one's own good qualities is no fault, if the related story contains the truth.

The ākhyāyikā, then, is, as it were, an autobiography. Considering the matter from this point of view, and bearing in mind that the kāvya in all its forms was intended only to be heard, the first of the mentioned points, viz. that concerning the division into chapters called ucchvāsas, appears in a new light. There is a connection between the ucchvāsas called chapters and the narrator, the hero. The term ucchvāsa means verbatim breathing out. Referring to our case, it appears to be quite natural that the whole story can scarcely have been told by the narrator in one breath. Pauses were necessary, and so the whole story was divided into parts of such a length that the narrating person, the hero, could relate his story in an easy way. The name ucchvāsa, which meant originally pause, was later on transferred to the part from one pause to another, and became finally the term for chapter. Every ucchvāsa, set forth in a poetical way, was with regard to its tenor, in some way or other complete in itself, and introduced by that couple of stanzas which has been spoken of above.

In the ākhyāyikā the hero himself narrates his own deeds. Bhāmaha's words regarding this are quite clear: vrttam ākhyāyate tasyām nāyakena svaceṣṭitam. Every word is of importance here: the subject-matter is not invented, but is based on real facts, it is recounted in a series of ucchvāsas; ākhyāyate is nothing more than the simple act of narrating, recounting, informing, as well as its derivations as ākhyāna etc. Because the hero recounts what he has experienced, this sort of prose composition is called ākhyāyikā.

The kathā is of quite a different nature. The subject-matter of the kathā is a more or less invented story. Kathā is the novel. The peculiarity of this kind of literary composition favoured the rising of more regular forms. In India this development was the easier as there always has been an inclination to create fixed schemes for all domains of human understanding. Thus, with respect to the kathā the case became similiar to that of the mahākāvya (sargabandha): The tenor losing its individuality was placed into the background, while the poetic embellishment took the first place. What was to be described in the kathā? No longer svacestita, which was shown to the hearer in all its natural variety and in all its individual features, but the seizing of girl, a struggle, separation, and finally, as a matter of course, the triumph of the hero. As in the nātaka, the happy ending of the plot is remarkable and characteristic for all compositions. Free play was given to the poet's fancy. Bhāmaha mentions some "signs or tokens," ankana. It is, however, not easy to say what those ankanas were. Perhaps the poet only wished to say, that the kathā is characterized by descriptions which spring from the kavi's imagination. Dandin replies (and some later writers have borrowed these objections) that such a description as kanyāharana etc. are seen also in the mahā $k\bar{a}vya$, so that they ought not to be considered as peculiarities of the kathā. This is not right in this form, as it is again a false interpretation of Bhāmaha's words. It may be that in the sayarbandha, too, similar descriptions are met with, but they take another rank therein. For, while those descriptions as we have seen are of a subordinate character in the mahākāvya, the main content of which is not a love-story but rather a poetical account of the deeds of a god or a king, in the kathā they are the very basis of the composition. Besides that, the mode of expression is so widely different in these two kinds of composition, tnat this fact alone would justify calling both by different names.

The kathā is, if we may be allowed to say so, a novel. If this is right, then śṛṅgāra-rasa, the sentiment of love, is above all developed therein. There are many intimations iddeed that this is the case. As we have seen, the Dhvanyāloka says a few words regarding the sorts of poetic compositions. As to the kathā, the author says, that, on the one hand, it shows the same style as the ākhyāyikā, but that, on the other hand, attention must be drawn to a distinctive feature peculiar to that sort of poetry; and this peculiarity consists in the fact that in the composition in question the description or rather development of the śrṅgāra-rasa takes place. Rudrata characterizes the kathā, still more distinctly, pointing out that this composition winds up with the winning of a girl, and that on account of this fact the rasa of śrṅgāra becomes fully developed; and therefore we read in the Sāhityadarpaṇa: kathāyāṃ sarasam vastu gadyair eva vinirmitam.

The character of the kathā being as described, we are not surprised to find that its linguistic form differs from that of the ākhyāyikā. As the hero is not himself the narrator, and as we have a continuous narration here, the conditions of which are different from those of the ākhyāyikā, it can be understood that a division into chapters (called ucchvāsa) is wanting, by which fact the appearance of the couple of vaktra and aparavaktra stanzas is excluded; but, on the other hand, there some stanzas may occur in the course of the story in the kathā as well as in the ākhyāyikā. The character of the whole is not changed thereby. It has been pointed out before that Dandin's remark regarding this point is based on an intentionally false interpretation of Bhamaha's words. The same must be said concerning the matter in question here. Dandin states (I, 24) that the kathā in contrast to the ākhyāyikā is to be narrated (nāyakenetareņa vā) by the nāyaka or another person. If we had not the book of Bhamaha, we could not but assume that Dandin states the opinion of his predecessor correctly. This is not the case. Through the supplementary itarena $v\bar{a}$ an important point of distinction is almost effaced. Dandin intends to make the question of the narrator quite subordinate, and to point out that $\bar{a}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{a}$ and $kath\bar{a}$ have no essential differences.

These have probably been the characteristic features of and also the connection between both ākhyāyikā and kathā during the period of Bhāmaha and Dandin. But, as other subjects out of the wide domain of alamkāra have undergone many changes in course of time, so, in the present case, the old views could not remain unaltered for ever. the kathā was less touched by such changes, (probably because it was younger), the ākhyāyikā had lost its original character already in the time of the Kāvyādarsa. Among the literary compositions there may have been many types of ākhyāyikā. That, however, is certain: Had Bāna's Harsacarita and Kādambarī. which two compositions are called akhyayika and kathā by the poet himself, been written before Dandin's time, then Dandin's treatment of these sorts of composition would have been totally different from the one we now find in the Kāvyādarśa.

The oldest example of $\bar{a}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{a}$ we know of is the Harşacarita by Bāṇa, who lived about the year 620 A.D. We shall analyse this poem from the standpoint of the $\hat{s}\bar{a}stra$, in order to get an idea what the form of $\bar{a}khy\bar{a}yik\bar{a}$ was in that period.

The composition opens with twenty-one introductory stanzas, the metre of which is the śloka. The beginning is a namaskriyā, first to Siva and Pārvatī (1, 2), secondly to Vyāsa (3). Then follows a long discourse about poet and poetry in general. We are told of bad kavis and plagiaries, of the difference of style, and of the difficulty for the good poet to combine all necessary qualities (4-8). In the highly interesting and important stanzas 10-18 the famous poets and poems are mentioned, eg. the poets Haricandra, Sātavāhana, Pravarasena, Bhāsa, Kālidāsa, and the poems Vāsavadattā, Brhatkathā, and, finally, Āḍhyarāja's Utsāha. In spite of these "stars" Bāṇa has decided to write an ākhyāyikā in honour of the king Harṣa (19). Stanza 20 contains a praise of the ākhyāyikā, and with a jagatī verse this metrical part closes.

We will stop here for a moment in order to compare what Rudrata has said regarding the ākhyāyikā with these introductory stanzas. According to Rudrata the introducton is in verse. It should contain first a namaskriyā to the gods and to the gurus or the guru. Secondly the introduction contains the praise of the former poets and the confession of one's own inability, and, finally, the expression of the poet's devotion to the king, which devotion is the cause (as we may add to complete Rudraţa's idea) that the poet notwithstanding his want of ability is willing to write the poem. All these peculiarities are found strictly observed in the introductory verses of Bana's. What else can be concluded from this strict agreement of theory and practice than that the prototye for Rudrata's ākhyāyikā was just the Harsacarita?

Bhāmaha and Dandin say nothing concerning these opening stanzas, so that it is doubtful whether according to the older opinion the ākhyāyikā was introduced by a metrical passage or not. Probably it was; for as according to Bhāmaha at the beginning of the first ucchvāsa there were not these two stanzas spoken of above, it must have been something else that was placed before the first chapter.

We return to the Harsacarita. After the described metrical part comes the prose story. As the poem has not been brought to an end by the author we possess only eight ucchvāsas. That the chapters were called ucchvāsas by Bāna himself is proved by what he says in the tenth introductory stanza: ucchvāsānte 'py akhinnās te yesām vaktre sarsvatī, katham ākhyāyikākārā na te vandyāķ kavīśvarāh. Here three terms: ucchvāsa, vaktra, and aparavaktra are alluded to excepting the first ucchvāsa, which begins with a 'scholarly' tract, every ucchvāsa opens with a pair of stanzas. The reader will very easily find out that these stanzas contain an indication of what is to happen in the chapter in question. As to the metre we have the following scheme: second ucchvāsa: two āryās, third ucchvāsa: one śloka and one āryā, fourth ucchvāsa: the same; fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth ucchvāsa: two ārvās each.

The prose part gives first a very detailed account of the poet's family which subject extends to the third ucchvāsa: the poet speaks of his ancestors and his youth (ucchvāsa 1), his introduction to the court by king Harsa's stepbrother. Though Bāṇa was received here rather coolly he soon grew the prince's favourite (2). After the poet had returned to his own country he narrates to his relatives the history of King Harsa. In the same (3rd) ucchvāsa this chief story begins and is treated up to the end of the whole tale, where it breaks off.

Sometimes there are stanzas in the ucchvāsas which are, however, of no great importance to the construction and the development of the story. In the first ucchvāsa we meet a stanza called aparavaktra by the author himself (p. 18), the second ucchvāsa contains three stanzas in vasantatilaka (p. 54), śārdūlavikrīdita (p. 69), and aparavaktra (p. 78); the third two pairs of stanzas: āryā (p. 86), sragdharā (p. 93); the fourth a couple of verses in vaktra and aparavaktra (p. 125: "vaktrāparavaktre papātha") and besides that, one verse in aryā (p. 140); the fifth a stanza in the sloka-metre (p. 153) and another in aparavaktra (p. 159), the sixth only one stanza in āryā; the two last ucchvāsa contain no verses at all, which is somewhat remarkable. Thus, the usual metres are the vaktra, aparavaktra, and āryā, which may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that in the older authoritative books on alamkāra these metres were spoken of chiefly.

Comparing these points also with what Rudrata says, a full agreement appears again. According to this scholar the poet should describe his own race in prose. Can this be considered as a typical feature of every ākhyāyikā? As that is not very probable, Rudrata has apparently generalised the case of the Harşacarita. Still something else may be gathered from this peculiar treatment of the matter by Rudrata, viz., that in the time of Rudrata the old type of of ākhyāyikā was but a matter of past ages and was only spoken of in a traditional way out of respect to the great masters. Further; at the head of every ucchvāsa the poet should give two stanzas in ārvā. A couple of stanzas, indeed, opens every chapter; and the metre is arya with the exception of the third and fourth ucchvāsa, where the former of these stanzas is a śloka. This is, of course, only a very slight variation, showing that this rule of Rudrata's should not be taken too strictly. Finally there is agreement concerning the metric form of the stanzas within the ucchvāsas themselves: According to Rudrata the metre is not prescribed, though vaktra. aparavaktra, and āryā are employed with preference, and this is the fact with the Harsacarita.

It is of still greater interest to compare the ākhyāyika, as it is represented by Bāṇā's Harṣacarita with the rules given by Bhāmaha. There are some points of manifest uniformity: first, the Harṣacarita is divided into chapters called ucchvāsas, secondly, these vcchvāsas, but not the first, are opened by stanzas indicating the tenors of the chapter in question, and thirdly the subject matter of the poem is not an invented story but a true account of something which was experienced (vrtta) by the hero or whosoever it may be.

Considering this last point, we see, however, a highly important difference. In the Hareacarita the hero himself is apparently not the narrator, but Harşadeva's biography is told by another person, who witnessed the described events. Though Bana gives a very minute account of his own race and though his personal affairs are closely connected with Harsadeva, he can by no means be considered as the nāyaka; the title of the work, too. is Harsacarita. As the poem is but a fragment, the length of the author's own biography appears to be of a mere casual character. A second difference (but far less important than the one just mentioned) concerns the metre of the stanzas which introduce every ucchvāsa: according to Bhāmaha the metre is vaktra and aparavaktra, while in the Harsacarita it is never of this kind but mostly āryā, vaktra and aparavaktra occur in Bana's work only in the ucchvasas themselves. This difference is, however, not so important as might be thought at first sight, because it has been pointed out on a previous occasion that, in spite of Dandin's interpretation, not the form of the metre but rather the indicative character of this couple of stanzas was in the opinion of Bhāmaha the essential matter

These considerations lead to an important result: the prototype of Bhāmah's ākhyāyikā was not the Harşacarita by Bāṇa, which does not agree with the theory, but some older work, which has not come to us. This fact makes it very improbable that Bhāmaha should have lived after Bāṇa, as some scholars are inclined to believe.

Thus we have a younger form of the ākhyāyikā, which in the seventh century A. D. was considered as a separate kind, in spite of Dandin's denial of the difference. _The following points may be mentioned as its chief characteristics:

- 1 The subject-matter gives historical facts.
- 2 It is not necessary that the hero himself is the narrator.
- 3 There are chapters called ucchvāsas.
- 4 Every ucchvāsa, but not the first, opens with two stanzas (metre usually āryā), which indicate what will happen in the ucchvāsa in question.
- 5 The whole story begins with a metric introduction of a literary character.

The ākhyāyikā was in contrast to the kathā; and the kathā is, as we have seen, the Indian novel. We possess two examples of kathā from the older period: Subandhu's Vāsavadattā and Bāṇa's Kādambarī. Though as regards this case matters are less complicated, we shall analyze both stories shortly in order to compare them with the doctrine of the śāstra.

Subandhu's Vāsavadattā begins with twelve introductory āryā stanzas, that commence with a namaskriyā to Sarasvatī, Kṛṣṇa, and Siva. After that the sinfulness of man and the inferiority of the whole world since king Vikramāditya's death, is spoken of. Then the good poets are praised, and with the statement of the poet's authorship the metric introduction closes. The contents of the prose need not be given here in detail.

It is a well-known fact that we do not find this form of the story as it is presented in Subandhu's work any where else in Indian literature, so that we may venture to assume that, at least as regards particulars, the story is invented by the poet, and this is the very fact which according to the opinion of the older ālaṃkārikas is a mark of difference between ākhyāyikā and kathā. To this point the words kaver alhiprāyakrtair ankanaiḥ kaiścid ankitā used in the definition of Bhāmaha must evidently refer. We have in this case the peculiar feature of a novel, which fact finds expression by Bhāmaha's term kanyāharaṇasaṃgrāmavipralxmbhodaya.

Mentioning this we come to a point in which the Vāsavadattā does not agree wholly with the theories of the old scholars, for in our novel the events are peaceful on the whole. The struggle we hear of in the last pages of the story has nothing to do with the development of the plot. It seems to be, on the contrary, totally unnecessary here. We will, however, abstain from pursuing the question further here. Conceding that the way Vasavadatta was carried off from her native town to the Vindhya mountains can be correctly called a kanyāharaņa (which is not probable), we hear not one word about a struggle caused thereby, and the word samgrāma can have no other meaning than "struggle", especially not here on account of the preceding aharana which means "taking by force."

Rudrata presents, as we have seen, some differences concerning the matter in question. Instead of kanyāharana he speaks of kanyālābha, which has not quite the same meaning as the former term, and what appears to be more important, he does not mention any samarāma. Considering this there can be no doubt that the prototype of Bhāmaha's kathā was by no means Subandhu's Vāsavadattā, but another story, in which the struggle caused by the seizing of a girl was described.

In other less important points the Vāsavadattā is in accordance with the opinion of Bhāmaha: the narrator is not the hero, nor is there a division into chapters (called ucchāsas), the tale being told without interruption up to the end. It need not be mentioned that there are no stanzas (vaktra and aparavaktra) indicating the tenor of the following parts. Within the story, however, the poet gives stanzas sometimes, but their metre is never vaktra and aparavaktra; verses occur three times: three stanzas: āryā, sārdūlavikrīdita, sārdūlavikrīdita: three stanzas: sikharinī, sikharinī, sragdhrā; one stanza: āryā.

Another example of the kathā is the Kadambarī by Bāṇa. It does not matter that this story has not been completed by the author himself, but by his son Bhūṣaṇabhaṭṭa. Though the tale is more intricate than the Vāsavadattā, the form is similar to that of the composition just described.

The prose-story is introduced by some stanzas in the vamsastha metre. They begin with a namas-kriyā to Brahman, Siva, and Viṣnu, and to the author's guru Bhatsu. After that the poet speaks of the sinfulness of men and of the effect of good poetry. Then follows an account of Bāṇa's race and family, and with the statement of the authorship the introduction comes to an end. Then follows the prose-story, the tenor of which need not be detailed.

It can easily be pointed out that, as in the case of the Harşacarita, Bāna's Kādambarī was the model for Rudrata's kathā. Concerning the introductory stanzas (śloka, in the word's wider sense) Rudrata says; iṣtān devān gurūn namaskrtya. Further the poet should, according to this author, describe his own race in verse shortly. The prose-story begins with another tale and ends with the winning of the beloved girl.

Thus the Kādambarī is a novel quite similar to the Vāsavadattā. The subject-matter is not based on a known itihāsa, but is sprung from the poet's own imagination. As well as in the Vāsavadattā nothing is said of a sangrāma.

It is very obvious here just as in the case of the Hārṣacarita that the prototype of Bhāmaha's kathā cannot have been the Kādambarī (nor the Vāsavadattā), but an older work, which we do not know yet. Combining this fact with some other considerations I can scarcely believe that Bāṇabhaṭṭa should have written before Bhāmaha.

The newer $kath\bar{a}$, then, shows the following features:

- 1 The subject-matter is a story for the most part invented by the poet, a love story ending with the union of the lovers.
 - 2 The narrator is not the hero himself.
 - 3 The story is not divided into chapters.
- 4 At the beginning there is a literary introduction in verse.

